
The Scriptures contained the words of God for early Friends, but because so many were confused in their minds they felt a necessity laid on them to emphasize the distinction. Had the name Logos, used by John, been left untranslated—as in the Old Testament the name Emanuel is left untranslated—probably the necessity would never have arisen.

Emanuel means "God with us." Logos means "The Word or Message," and we may be thankful it was translated, for what nobler or more expressive title could have been found; but whenever the confusion in men's thoughts which made the distinction necessary shall disappear, then doubtless our "testimony" will have served its purpose. Its literal maintenance has not always been clearly understood, I fear, either by Friends themselves or those whom they desired to set right.

Thus much by way of preface. Let us now come straight to our own times and see how the two contentions regarding the status and office of the Bible have stood the test of the centuries. Time tries all, sifts the true from the false, and separates the things which cannot be shaken from those that have rested upon a foundation of sand.

The century now closed has been marked by an unparalleled advance in all departments of human knowledge. Its results mould our whole outward life. In this paper we concern ourselves only with the light that modern research has shed upon a far distant past.

Between our standpoint and that of 250 years ago what a gulf is fixed. Then, nothing was known of any ancient writings except the Greek and Roman classics. The Bible, like Melchizedek, stood alone, unrelated to every other thing—not to be compared or collated with any book, for there was none of its average age with which to compare it. A solitary star it shone in a dark firmament.

Not only was the entire ancient literature of the East unknown, but of the history and even the bare existence of the great empires that had surrounded Palestine, scarce a record remained. Yet they had been far advanced in civilization before Abram led his flocks out of Haran. Few men travelled far in George Fox's time, and for those who did, the records they saw were a sealed book. The monuments of Egypt were meaningless, for no one had deciphered their hieroglyphics, and as to the vast mounds under which the cities of Assyria and Babylonia lay buried, they were unvisited. Who would have dreamt that the public libraries of successive races, stretching back through thousands of years, were waiting there, preserved more perfectly in some respects than the Old Testament records, to be revealed in their appointed season.

Since English students of the 17th century did not regard the Bible as within the scope of ordinary history they shrank from any investigation of Scripture from the historical standpoint. They would have deemed it profanation; and so it came about that much in the sacred books which to the mind of to-day not only is open to scrutiny but imperatively calls for it, passed unnoticed by them. We find it difficult to understand how this can have been, but as before said, every period has its peculiar problems. Our forefathers were seen seekers, but their search lay in other directions.

For us, now, all this is changed. The temples and tombs of Egypt have been opened, and on their inscribed walls we can study her history, dynasty after dynasty, through countless generations. Her ancient peoples live and move before us. We read much of their victories and something of their defeats. We know their habits and daily doings from cradle to grave. Much of their way of thinking and all the details of their religious belief are familiar to us. We have even the pictured record of their conception of the Soul, passing, after death, to stand before the divine judgment seat, there to be examined as to the deeds done during this mortal life, and to receive due reward or punishment. There is no mistake about it. Much of the sculpture is as clear-cut and bright as when first chiselled and colored. Nay more: We are now finding the Egyptian version of the Hebrew episode, and any day the full statement of the case from Pharaoh's standpoint, if it is allowable to put it so, may come to light. Yet still more than this has Egypt to tell us. From the rubbish heaps of one of her cities of a later era, dating from the 1st or 2nd century A. D., there have quite recently been recovered fragmentary manuscripts recording our Lord's own sayings—once the cherished treasure of some early Christian. Some of these sayings correspond (with variations) to texts in the New Testament, whilst one at least is wholly new—what may not to-morrow bring forth!

To turn to Israel's neighbors on the eastern border—the successive empires of the Euphrates valley,—we are learning their secrets too. Nineveh, Babylon and other ancient centers of civilization are yielding to the explorer of to-day tons upon tons of their long-hidden writings. These are being deciphered, and they reveal to us the laws of the State, the transactions of the market, the ritual of their temples and the mythology of their religion. Wonderful to say, among these latter have been discovered narratives more or less parallel to parts of the Pentateuch, amongst others the Chaldeans' account of Noah and of the Flood. This version, I may add, is infinitely inferior to the one we have so long known.

While this flood of light was revealing the history of the nations that had most powerfully affected the fortunes of Israel, a kindred spirit of inquiry had led others to examine the various books of which the Bible itself is composed, in order to ascertain whether new light might not be gleaned from them. This line of inquiry did not begin by challenging their sacred or inspired character, but it did proceed on the assumption that whatever else the Scriptures might be, they were literature, and, as such, open to critical study and to comparison with other literature.

This proposal to call upon the Bible to render account for itself like any other collection of writings, struck at the very foundation of the pedestal upon which the Scriptures had been exalted as something so sacred as to be beyond all challenge or question—the pedestal against which our early Friends had themselves protested.

But zealous defenders joined issue at once with these inquisitive and unsatisfied persons who desired to examine for themselves, and a new and violent conflict soon arose between them.

Most unfortunately, the Bible, in the minds of its would-be defenders, was too often confounded with their own narrow and ignorant interpretation of it. They could not credit it as possible that they should have misconceived its purpose and meaning, and everything that ran counter to their preconceptions they began to cry out against as atheism. Both sides naturally became embittered, and many were forced into an attitude of hostility who had never approached the question in that spirit at all. It has been a sad and a pitiable spectacle to see so grand a cause so terribly mishandled. The Bible's worst foes have sometimes been those of its own household, and the word of God has been made void and discredited, while the battle raged around the banner of man's tradition.

The conflict is not over, but it is drawing to a close and we may look round to see what has become of our Bible and where we ourselves stand.

Foremost of all we recognize that this instinct of critical research which is the characteristic of our time, is no emissary of evil, but God's minister for the further education of mankind—to be welcomed, not feared—irresistible alike whether we welcome it or not.

It is in the air we breathe. No man can live upon the dead atmosphere of a by-gone century or nourish his soul by closing his eyes and ears.

Neither can he hope to draw help and inspiration from his Bible unless he believes in it, and he does not in any real sense believe in it so long as he is afraid to see it subjected to all and every honest test and to open it to the strong light of day.

George Fox's touchstone, testing all things by the Holy Spirit operating in the heart, has come triumphant through the ordeal, and is as applicable now as in his own times. From that test the Bible has also come out not only unscathed, but fuller of Divine meaning for us than ever before. When we see how utterly the mistaken standard against which our forefathers protested has been cut down we are impressed anew with what I may perhaps call the sober sanity of the old Quaker view.

Less hampered than others (would that we could say wholly unhampered) by traditions of men the Friend is free to welcome every new light that is shed on the letter of the Scriptures. The Spirit is but little affected by it, and in no case can Truth of any kind conflict with or cloud the Spirit. Our Society in England through its Summer Schools and Settlements and all available channels is encouraging thorough study. All the windows of its heart it opens to the day, and a renewal of spiritual life and a deepened interest in the Bible story are being experienced as the natural consequence.

Yet one word more, and I close. Even enlightenment has its dangers. We may deliberately put away one idol, but it is perilously easy to construct another and to enshrine it and to be worshipping it before we realize what we have done.

There is I believe grave peril now, in the very joy and enthusiasm that comes with newly-won knowledge lest we make an idol of intellectual attainment and give it foremost place in our thoughts.

We dare not reject knowledge, but we must keep it in its proper place or it will lead us astray.

Let us turn once more to our Bible and recall that knowledge (by itself) puffeth up. It is Wisdom that buildeth up. The "Wisdom," like "The Word," is one of the attribute-names of Christ—"Seek Wisdom, saith the preacher, and in all thy getting, get understanding."

And we are to seek it, not in busying ourselves upon the paths of literary attainment, but by sitting like Mary at the feet of our Lord, to receive from Him of His Spirit. Then indeed, and only then, shall we have chosen that better part which will never be taken from us.

NEW TESTAMENT LESSON.—No. 37.

FORM AND SPIRIT.

GOLDEN TEXT.—The letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life.

—II. Corinthians, iii., 6.

Before study of Lesson read I. Corinthians, xiii., 1-13.

PAUL wrote for his time, and, in the main, for his people. The form in which his epistles are written makes little appeal to our time. Many of the questions which he discusses at length have so far disappeared as to seem trivial. Questions of formal Jewish observance, circumcision, the eating of meat offered to idols, the exact place of the Jewish law, the relations of sin, grace and the law—these are reminders that the great apostle was a Pharisee of the Pharisees, a student under the rabbis. A man must think in terms of his experience. We could not look for the simplicity and directness of Jesus in one of Paul's upbringing. He delighted in logical formulas, in stiff legal statements. There could be no better example of the power of the spirit of Christ than in its bursting the bounds of Paul's vocabulary, in making itself felt in spite of his often narrow and pedantic forms of expression. There could be no greater error than that which looks to Paul as the real founder of Christianity. All that is of permanent value in his teaching is due to the spirit reflected from his great predecessor. That which comes from Paul himself—the peculiarities of thought and speech which are characteristic of his personality—have given rise to most of the unchristian conflicts which have rent the Christian church these two thousand years. No schism has ever resulted from the Sermon on the Mount; no wars have arisen from the parables by the sea; no uncharitableness has been founded on the eleventh commandment. But evils of every type have sheltered themselves under Paul's pharisaic legalism.

Yet it need not be so. If we approach his writings in the true spirit of the truth seeker, we will find there the spirit of the Master hidden in the unfamiliar construction of the disciple. This does not mean to approach him as an oracle, but as an earnest, honest, self-devoted man; passionate, loving, subject to fits of extreme depression, and to corresponding fits of exaltation; a man burdened with ill health, working beyond his strength, careless of personal interests, longing only to further his Master's kingdom. If we come to his writings thus understandingly we will not be disturbed by the involved style, the self-contradiction, the crude illustrations, the false analogies. In one verse (Rom., v., 8) he speaks of God's love for us "while we were yet sinners"; in the next he speaks of our being saved from the "wrath of God" (Rom., v., 9). He says of "the fathers" that they "drank of a spiritual rock that followed them" (I. Cor., x., 4). He quotes promises as given to Abraham and his "seed" (Gal., iii., 16). Because this is singular and not plural he infers that this is a reference to Jesus. If one undertakes to explain such expressions as divine oracles he is lost in obscure dialectics, which lead only to controversy. Christianity is not a formal system, but a life by the spirit. It cannot be expressed in a set of formulas. It is an attitude toward our fellow men and toward the truth. Those are Christians who meet the world in the loving, unselfish spirit of the Christ, whether or no they use such phrases as "justification by faith," "resurrection," "blood of Christ," or any others. Thus Paul met the world. These expressions were not formulas to him, but vital, living speech. By means of them he urged righteousness of life upon men and women to whom such language had real and immediate meaning. Paul dealt constantly with that on which conduct is founded. Do right for love of the brethren, not because of the ten commandments. Spend yourself for mankind, not because it is a hard duty to be done, but because you long for them, yearning over their unhappiness. You are not required to do this service or that if you are free in Christ; you are privileged to serve and thus reach the heights of which you are capable. You are free from law, not because law is an evil, but because you do not need it. You are free as a child, become a man, is free from the law of his parents, not because he despises his parents, but because he has a better guide. Like the steamboat, he has a motive power in the deep, warm heart of him, and a sure compass so he can go where he will, not obliged to seek out his course by tacking hither and thither according to the winds of law and custom. He may do what he will, because his will is right before God. That the spirit of Paul is the same as that of his Master, becomes clear in the few cases in which Paul throws aside his complexity of style, forgets his legal turn of mind and speaks out his soul in the poetry of earnest enthusiasm. Such is the chapter with which our lesson begins. The same spirit is made evident even more clearly in the self-denying, loving service which made up the active period of his life—suffering long and yet kind, hoping and enduring all things.

I do not in my best moods think of death, but of life. I would live as though there was no such thing in the world as death for me or for others. I would live with my thoughts amid things that endure, in work and duty and love, until death itself is consumed in life, the resurrection going on day by day, this mortal putting on immortality.—[Horatio Stebbins.]

ON BEING NEIGHBORS.

THE message the settlement workers have been giving us is that neighbors should learn to know each other and to live with each other on such terms that all together, and each one individually, should do all that can be done to make the neighborhood the best it possibly could be; also, that if any one who has had the best advantages in the way of a good education in college and university, and of a good home—if such a one knows of a neighborhood made up of those who have not had such advantages, he (or she) might do well to go and live in that neighborhood and become a part of it and contribute the best he has toward making its ideals and its life a little higher than they could have been without such contribution. People who wish to do this sort of work and are free to do it go to live at the Hull House with Jane Addams and her neighbors, or at the Chicago Commons with Graham Taylor, or at one of the Philadelphia College Settlements. These settlement workers, in going to live among people who used not to be sought out for neighbors and companions and friends by cultured people, have found that it has not been self-sacrifice, but rather self-development. They have found that just as much as these "poor" people needed them they needed the poor people. They learned the same lesson that teachers learn, that you never know a thing so thoroughly until you set about imparting it to some one else. Just as love cannot have its fullest and highest development until there is a loved one who can make no return, so we have not had the truest and best of life until we have shared whatever culture we have been privileged to attain to with those who have not had such opportunities as we.

And so the message of the "settlement workers" has been that the poor and ignorant need those who have leisure and culture, and none the less the leisured and the cultured need to mingle as neighbors and friends on equal terms with those who have little time for culture, and need help in attaining more of it.

Ten years and more ago a settlement here and there, in Chicago, New York, Boston, Philadelphia, was experimenting along this line. The movement spread until nearly every large city has its settlement, some of them half a dozen, Chicago over twenty. But one settlement cannot do this work for a large city; nor can twenty settlements do it for Chicago or New York or Philadelphia. As for the smaller towns no one ever thinks of starting settlements in them, and the plan breaks down completely when one thinks of applying it to country districts. The few settlements we have cannot be thought of as anything more than experiment stations. They have not seriously set about to do the work they have pointed out as so much needing to be done.

The fact is we are not likely ever to see a settlement in every ward or every precinct, in every town and village, and in every country district. And yet there is need for settlement work in every precinct and every village and every township. Right about us in the very neighborhood in which each one of us lives there are those whom we do not know and who do not know us. There are those who are not giving to one another the best that each has to give and who are not doing their best to fit in with one another to make the neighborhood a unity working all together toward the highest ideals.

A young Friend who had been brought up in a neighborhood rather forlorn except for a few well-to-do farmers who are "kind" to their poorer neighbors, had gone away from her home to engage in philanthropic work. She had gone to the city for an opportunity to mingle with those less cultured; yet she confessed that there were poor folks near her home, a whole village full of them. Even on her father's farm there had lived for years an Irish family inside of whose house she had never been.

Within a stone's throw of many of our largest meeting-houses there live enough people who never "go to church" to fill the meeting-house to overflowing; what might well be of still more interest, there are perhaps more than enough children within the same radius to make the "largest Sunday-school" in the town. Yet perhaps it is but a handful who attend the meeting, and as for the First-day school—well, "there are hardly any Friends' children in this neighborhood any more."

If any young Friend has become interested in the settlement idea, and in these days there must be many, he does not need to go off to live in a settlement in order to find a field for work. The best basis for settlement work is not an institution. When you think of starting one in your own home village or country neighborhood you see the truth of that

The basis for the sort of work the settlement workers have called attention to the need of is the home—your own home, together with your neighbor's home. Neighbor means nigh-dweller, the one who lives near you. If you have any light that helps you in your life, and you have a neighbor, a nigh-dweller, who is not the better for that light, then your neighborhood is not as good as you could make it. If you sit in meeting and realize how blessed it is to be there and how much it means to you to come there and worship in that way, and yet know that within a mile of the meeting-house there are many who do not know that blessedness, whose lives do not have the uplift that yours has because of the thoughts you have and live by, then your meeting and your religious life do not mean as much as they might in that neighborhood.

We need to study the settlement movement with the view of making our own homes and our own local meetings the basis for the sort of neighborhood work the settlement workers have called our attention to.

LIFE FROM DEATH.

THERE is nothing that occurs like death to emphasize the wisdom and grandeur of the All-Creative Power. Do we not see the beauty and fitness in the changing seasons, as the natural life in autumn is prepared for the oblivion of winter, to reappear in the spring-time in new forms of beauty and usefulness? We are forcibly reminded of this by the passing onward of our aged Friend Harriet E. Kirk. For many years she was a valued Associate Editor of the INTELLIGENCER, and we hold her in grateful remembrance when we recall her varied concerns, and her great activity in promoting the cause of Truth as held by Friends, especially her earnestness in the matter of informing the young as to our fundamental principle, and its outgrowing testimonies. But when age and waning powers announced that for her the winter of life had come, she could have bravely said,

“Not myself, but the truth that in life I have spoken;
Not myself, but the seed that in life I have sown,—
Shall pass on to ages,—all about me forgotten,
Save the truth I have spoken, the deeds I have done.”

An instinctive feeling of gratitude arises that she, in the times that are past, so well fulfilled her mission, inspiring her successors to face the future with renewed trust. God calls from earth his co-laborers, but not until they have already sown seed which is somewhere maturing in their various stages of development for the furtherance of His work. Sometimes this development is slow and veiled from human sight, but the Christ spirit still lives and is constantly at work with us. We must press forward always keeping the watch, in these days of perpetual advancement, that we may not lose any vital principle by reason of unfaithfulness,

“To the beautiful order of God's works
May we conform the order of our lives.”

We can ever trust the Creative Power to sustain and uphold that which He has created, even when our finite vision fails to see His wisdom.

PAXSON.—On Sixth-day, the 9th of Tenth month, 1903, at her late residence, Folsom, Pa., Mary Anna Paxson passed away from this life. Her death will be a shock to her relatives and friends, as it came with the suddenness characteristic of heart failure.

Mary Anna Paxson was the daughter of Joseph and Rachel Broadhurst, and was born in Solebury township, Bucks county, Pa., Ninth month 16th, 1818. In 1840 she married Samuel Johnson Paxson. They had four children, only one of whom, Helen M. Bye, survives her. Shortly after her marriage she removed with her husband to Newtown, where he engaged in the conduct of the Newtown Journal. Soon after this he purchased the Doylestown Democrat, and they lived in Doylestown until he relinquished the management of the paper and retired to Buckingham. In 1888, some years after his death, she removed to Folsom, Pa., where she has since resided.

Kindly in disposition, equable in temperament, of sterling character and sound judgment, she was a helpful wife, a loving and untiring mother, and a friend to all the deserving needy that applied to her. The tender tribute of a fond remembrance will encircle her memory in the hearts of those who knew her. F. P. B.

PEASLEE.—In South Pittsfield, New Hampshire, on Ninth month 21st, 1903, of peritonitis, Edith Agnes Peaslee, in her 14th year. She was the eldest of three children of Albert N. and Hannah Peaslee, and a grandchild of Amos J. and Hannah Peaslee, late of Mickleton, N. J.

PENROSE.—On Tenth month 9th, 1903, Alice T., wife of Benjamin F. Penrose, of Ogontz, Pa.

SHELDON.—At her home in Salt Point, Dutchess county, N. Y., Eighth month 30th, Mary Browning, beloved wife of Jonathan Sheldon, in her 81st year.

She was a life-long member with Friends, and her quiet life was in full accord with their principles. In her family, and among the many relatives and friends who enjoyed her hospitality, she manifested all those sterling qualities belonging to a true Christian life. Indeed no one could help feeling better and nobler who came within her influence, for all through her many days she carried that peaceful, holy calm so suggestive of her beautiful life, that it proved both inspiring and refreshing to those about her. And as one day, so were all, even in her failing strength, which was borne with an heroic effort, passing on to the loved ones ministering to her needs the pleasant smile and cheering word. She was twice married, her first husband being William H. Cornell. While no children blessed that union, by her second marriage she found loving step-children, and was most tenderly cared for through her last tedious illness by a daughter who will ever cherish the sweetest of memories.

And though we cannot clasp her hand,
Nor look upon her face,
Nor listen to her voice again,
Nor watch her ways of grace,—

Still we can keep her memory bright,
And walk the way she trod,
And know she waits until we come
Up to the house of God.

WARRINGTON.—Tenth month 9th, 1903, Ellis Gartley Warrington, infant son of Curtis and Elizabeth Gartley Warrington.

THE United States Geological Survey will next year investigate the mining resources of southeastern Alaska, the formation in the Yukon country and the oil deposits in Alaska.

INSTEAD of resolutions, the universal peace union at Mystic adopted "convictions," and the new word seems fitting. Why should you resolve that a thing is so when you are convinced that it is so? The change in usage can be recommended to any assemblage that has genuine convictions. Political conventions, of course, will continue to "resolve."—[Springfield Republican.]

NOTES.

PHILADELPHIA Yearly Meeting's Committee on Philanthropic Labor meets at the Race Street Meeting-house on the 31st at 1.30 in the afternoon. Few members or ministers of our Society were more widely known or more universally loved than the late Robert S. Haviland. Those who attended the conference at Chappaqua know how much his cheery presence and executive ability contributed to the pleasure and comfort of the visitors. Feeling that there must be many Friends in the seven yearly meetings who would appreciate some token of remembrance of this dear Friend, New York Yearly Meeting has issued a memorial with portrait, a copy of which will be sent without cost to any applicant sending his address to Franklin T. Carpenter, 787 Park avenue, New York.

Friends' City Home Association, an organization of Friends, Fourth and Arch street branch, has recently opened a comfortable and home-like boarding house at 1623 Summer street. Our desire is to provide the shelter of a Christian home for those of our young members who come to the city to engage in business. About twenty guests can be accommodated. E. K. H.

Friends in Sydney, New South Wales, have put up a new meeting-house which was expected to be ready for use by the end of Eighth month, the formal opening to be Sixth-day, the 18th of Ninth month. The Australian Friend of Eighth month, which is just to hand, reports the meetings there to be fairly well attended on First-day, both morning and evening.

Arthur Pierson, an active member of the meeting in Melbourne, Australia, left there on the 23d of Seventh month, by the Suevic for America, by way of London, his intention being to study in the dental department of the University of Pennsylvania.

The General Meeting of Friends in Australia was to begin its sittings on the 21st of Ninth month. William Cooper, of Sydney, is clerk of the meeting.

Friends in Auckland, New Zealand, hold lantern meetings for the children on First-day evenings, the meeting-house often being filled.

The Friends' High School of Tasmania has been placed under the care of London Yearly Meeting.

COMMUNICATION.

MINISTRY AND SILENCE.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

I MUST thank you for your recent editorials "An Educated Ministry" and "Silent Meetings," in which you referred to a rather incomplete letter of mine. The reason I thank you is, that it gives interested ones other views of very interesting subjects.

In common with many of your readers I am a firm believer in an educated minister, such for instance as we find in Isaac Hillborn, John J. Cornell, Joel Borton, Isaac Wilson, etc. I do not wish to appear a champion of the "paid preacher," for such is not the case, but I do think that some provision should be made whereby those who feel called upon to speak, may have the means of equipping themselves for their work,—where we as a society may help those whom God hath chosen as messengers to better fulfil their mission.

I would not for an instant detract from the beauty of the "silent moment" but I question the wisdom of a society failing to provide in its meetings spiritual food of some character, that will enlighten or teach or inspire its members. Silent public worship stands more as an ideal. It fails to "feed the multitude."

If our beloved Lord Jesus had gathered his chosen twelve in silent meeting and had not instructed them to go forth and preach the gospel, we would have had no Christian religion to-day and would have failed to gain the knowledge of salvation. If St. Paul had not preached and written his message, but had gathered a chosen few in silent meditation, the world would have lost a great Christian light. If George Fox had gathered a number of personally convinced ones and had been satisfied to hold silent meetings would we be able to-day to point to that message, "Mind the light"?

Silent meetings may be an ideal of those who deem themselves saved, but the voice of the Master is commanding us, "Go rather unto the lost sheep and as ye go, preach, saying the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand." The value of the "silent moment," in contemplation, after a message, cannot be over estimated but alone it can accomplish little. The music of the waterfall helps the silence of the wilderness. The singing of the birds makes more pronounced the beauty of the woodland stillness.

During the summer just passed, I visited a number of meetings. After a painfully small, silent gathering, and this in a well-known Friends' community, I said to a regular attendant, "Is it possible that this represents all those interested in our Society?" His reply, "Our speakers are at Buck Hill," seemed to satisfactorily solve the mystery. At another place where I was staying, word had been passed that a well-known speaker would attend the meeting and the many teams gathered about bespoke a full meeting-house,—full because the members were spiritually hungry. The same meeting-house, several weeks later, presented less than forty, notwithstanding the fact that the scholars of the First-day School were present. I asked the cause and was told by an elderly farmer, "We just can't get our people out to come an set."

God has entrusted us with a message—are we faithful to his trust? It may be wise to follow in the footsteps of our fathers but it is safer and better to follow in those of our Master. Silent worship may meet the demands of those "in tune with the Infinite," but it goes over the heads of the men and women who want to learn and who need our help. Our membership fails to increase and the interest of those who are already among the number lags, because there is little either to inspire or to stimulate. W. J. MAC WATERS.

FRIENDS AND MONEY-GIVING.

"If God will be with me . . . and will give me bread to eat and raiment to put on . . . then shall the Lord be my God . . . and of all that Thou shalt give me I will surely give the tenth unto Thee."

I ONCE knew a day laborer (a devout man) whose income was not over $500 a year, but who religiously laid out the tenth of it on the church and in charity.

I know a college-bred man whose bonds and stocks foot up over a million of dollars. He is still in active business, and his income from all sources is one hundred thousand dollars a year. His expenses foot up $50,000 (including church and charities) and the surplus $50,000 is added yearly to his capital. Now picture to thyself, dear reader, the joy he might purchase, if, instead of building bigger barns to hold his surplus fruits and goods, he made himself rich toward God by giving Him his entire yearly surplus. His children might be thus drawn away from those habits that endanger the heirs of millionaires, to share in the exquisite pleasure of making others happy.

Not all of us have incomes sufficiently large to supply all our needs and leave 50 per cent. to give away besides. Have you ever considered how $5 a year sounds when divided among the 52 First-days. Some of our meetings have members who contribute one dollar a year. For the privilege of meeting together to worship God, ten cents a First-day cannot be regarded as a very heavy tax. A dollar a year you will see is less than two cents for each First-day, and is no contribution at all for an able-bodied person. In my opinion, the cure of our "greatest need" will depend very greatly on the open-handedness of our members. It will need home-missionaries and money to arrest the marasmus that decimates our Society.

Dear Friend, try the plan of the Patriarch Jacob, and lay out on our church and in charity one-tenth of thy income.

FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF FRIENDS' PRINCIPLES IN CANADA.

AT Canada Half Yearly Meeting held the 29th of last month, the formation of a Central Association at Toronto was approved, with William G. Brown as President, and Isaac Wilson, George Phillips and Lewis Toole as an Advisory Committee. An invitation will be extended to Pelham Half Yearly Meeting to co-operate.

The general objects are the renewal of interest among those who have not been for a time particularly identified with Friends: the extension of religious principles consistent with the spirit of broad Christian liberty and unity; the advancement of the educational interests, and the making more effective the voice of the Society in conjunction with other like-minded people, in promoting moral reform and better citizenship.

Its formation is largely the result of the decision to bring the General Conference to Toronto next summer, affording a means it is hoped of carrying on a work to which the conference naturally opens the way.

NEW WORKERS WANTED.

THE usefulness of the American Purity Alliance could be greatly increased by the accession to its working force of the many young men and young women whose ardent desire is to throw themselves into some reform work, but as yet have made no choice.

It is to such conscientious and strong-souled young people that we must look for helpers in purity work. They are coming to us slowly and these are warmly welcomed, but we look for a greater number of recruits to join our ranks as time goes on.

There is something in our work that is peculiarly attractive and encouraging. It is especially suited to young people because they have the most influence over other young people, knowing their tastes and their trials and their mutual needs.

A young man or a young woman is able to reach others and impress them in a manner not open to older people, and here is a field of Christian endeavor that has as yet been hardly entered, and which is attractive to the active young spirits all about us.

A beautiful feature of purity work is that its most effective results are seen among the young; here are gained its most brilliant victories. When a boy or girl has been properly instructed, that one is pretty sure to keep the character free from stain. The object of the chief part of our work is to prevent errors, rather than to cause persons to repent them. We keep a bright light flashing from the light-house in order that human vessels will avoid the dangerous reefs, so that there will be no need of dragging them off the rocks and repairing the broken hulls.

While we do what we can to restore the erring, yet our most urgent call we feel to be preservation of the innocent.

Here again the work is seen to be attractive to the earnest young man or woman because it deals with the purity and goodness of character that is found in the soul of the young, endeavoring to so strengthen and instruct, that the native purity absorbs the element virtue, and fortifies itself for the struggle that lies before it.

The most important part of this kind of reform is thus seen to deal with purity rather than impurity, with holiness rather than with sin; to be occupied with preserving that which is sweet and good from contamination with what is foul and wrong.

There are those of so tender and lofty a nature, so full of divine compassion for the erring and suffering that they are not satisfied unless they are searching in the wilderness of sin for the lost ones of the flock. These have our deep sympathy and active assistance. Yet it remains true that prevention is better than cure and that preventive work yields manifold better results.

To this work therefore we sound the call to service. Come and join the forces that are working to preserve and strengthen the character of the present and coming generations. You who rejoice in the charming innocence and beauty of young girlhood; you who glory in the strength, courage and nobility of young manhood; you who have tears and tender memories of motherhood; you to whom the word home means so much of love and service, safety and comfort; you who so love your country that you would lay on her altar, if required, all that you possess, even life itself;—in your hands lies the hope of future generations! In the name of girlhood and manhood and motherhood and home and country, in the name of the pure Christ whose followers you are, help us to hold high the white banner of purity.—[The Philanthropist.]

THERE is always hope in the man who actually and honestly works. In idleness alone is there perpetual despair.—[Carlyle.]

FAITH must be rightly understood, not as belittling human reason, but enlarging it. Faith really means personal submission to personal influence, not the assent of the mind to doctrines.—[Dr. Alfred E. Garvie, at Woodbrooke Settlement.]

A WHITTIER PILGRIMAGE.

PART I.—EAST HAVERHILL.

It was with a very confused idea as to the relative position of the Whittier landmarks that we set out to find them a week or two ago. That they were somewhere in the neighborhood of Boston was of course well known, but as to where and how to reach them we had a very vague idea. To aid those who may sometime wish to go over the same ground, this letter sketch has been prepared, and it may be helpful.

Haverhill is a town on the Merrimac River, somewhat over an hour's ride, almost directly north from Boston and not far from the New Hampshire line. It is a bustling, apparently thriving town, given up to manufacture of shoes and containing about 28,000 inhabitants. Three miles east of Haverhill, on the road to Amesbury and Newburyport, and reached by a line of electric cars leaving Haverhill every hour, is the Whittier homestead, where the poet was born, Twelfth month 17th, 1807. The house was purchased shortly after Whittier's death by a wealthy friend in Haverhill, who presented it to nine trustees to hold in trust as a memorial of the poet, and as a public museum of Whittier's relics. It was directed that it should be furnished and kept in as near as possible the same condition as when the Whittier family occupied it.

At the roadside when one alights from the "electrics," as new England people mostly call their trolley cars, is a large plain granite stone, inscribed "The Birthplace of John G. Whittier." One hundred yards or more northwardly up the side road, which at this point enters the main road over which we have just traveled, is the old frame farm house. It is on the left of this latter road and the barn is across the road on the right. It was this highway that in the morning after the storm became, as Whittier tells in "Snow Bound,"

"A fenceless drift that once was road."

The farm is occupied by a family who are also caretakers of the house. The rules of the trustees provide that it shall be open to the public certain afternoons in the week, and we were somewhat alarmed on reading the notice, as the day we were there was not an open day, but the pleasant caretaker invited us in, saying that "no one was ever turned away." An admission fee of 10 cents is charged, which goes to support the property.

The house is in fine order, the kitchen with its great fire place restored as near as may be to its original condition, with the oldtime furniture and furnishings.

Sitting in a comfortable chair, with a copy of "Snow Bound," the picture of the home of long ago was wonderfully real. At the side was "Mother's room," raised a step or two above the level of the kitchen floor, the bed furnished with her coverlet and sheets. In the southwest corner was the room in which the poet was born, now simply furnished, with numerous family portraits on the wall. Outside were to be seen the gate post, the leaning well curb, the barn and other familiar objects mentioned in the famous poem. There too were the bee hives, and at the foot of the well-kept lawn, the Brook, and near by the stone wall which Whittier helped build, and mentions in the poem "The Barefoot Boy."

"Laughed the brook for my delight
Through the day and through the night,
Whispering at the garden wall
Talked with me from fall to fall."

We wandered through the garden full of autumn bloom and along the park-like side of the brook with its many ripples and artificial falls made in olden times to utilize the water for mill purposes. While part of our party rested the writer climbed to the top of Job Hill, which overshadows the little homestead and brings the sunsets near and the evening twilight earlier than to other farms nearby. From the top of the hill is an extended and beautiful view, reaching away over a rolling, well wooded country in all directions. The little brook could be seen wandering through the meadow to a larger water course, which in turn could be traced by the brilliant flame of the swamp maples along its course to the Merrimac River, itself hidden by the intervening hills. The public road with its trolley stretches away to Haverhill in one direction, and uphill and down on through the little town of Merrimac to Amesbury in the other. The whole picture is vividly described in Samuel T. Pickard's "Life of Whittier." In coming down from Job Hill one appreciates his story of the old ox, "Butter" and his rapid descent for it is indeed very steep, and the short cropped grass makes it slippery as well.

An interesting fact in connection with the farmhouse nestling in the valley is that while from the top of Job Hill scores of nearby houses may be counted, there is not a single house visible from the Whittier home. The isolation is complete.

Thomas Whittier, the father, died in 1830, and in 1836 the farm was sold. It was eight miles up hill and down to the meeting at Amesbury, whither the family went regularly on First and Fifth-days. The poet had by this time become absorbed in his literary and reform work, and the care of a hundred and forty-eight acre farm was more than he could manage. After the farm was sold a house was bought in Amesbury, nearly opposite the Friends' Meeting-house.

The good taste with which the house has been restored, the order in which it and grounds are kept, the simple furnishing, the absence almost entirely of the commercial spirit, make it indeed a happy and fitting memorial of the "Quaker Poet." We could only estimate the number of pilgrims who visit it, but the register kept for this purpose was filled with names of people from all over the United States, naturally more from New England than from other sections. After purchasing a copy of "Snow Bound," some of the ever present souvenir postal cards, which together with two views of the house make up all the stock in trade, we reluctantly came away, pausing to pick up a granite pebble from the brook to keep in remembrance of our visit.

From East Haverhill to Amesbury by the trolley is now a pleasant trip of less than an hour, what must have taken the Whittiers nearly two with their single horse. We did not see the gander which so badly frightened Whittier when a boy, as he and his father trudged up the hill to save the horse, nor were any of the gander's descendants around. But with a crisp, clear autumn day it is difficult to imagine a more pleasant ride than over the Merrimac hills from Haverhill to Amesbury. C. F. J.

WOOLMAN'S JOURNAL AS A SCHOOL CLASSIC.

It is gratifying to note the high appreciation in which the Journal of John Woolman is held outside the Society of Friends. It has recently been published by the Macmillan Company in their series of pocket American and English classics, price twenty-five cents, edited for use in secondary schools. The volume includes the testimonials of the Quarterly Meeting held at York, England, and of the Monthly Meeting of Burlington, N. J., and an introductory biographical sketch from which we extract the following paragraphs:

"No man has yet appeared on this side the Atlantic who has possessed in larger measure that inward repose which is free alike from the disturbances of the egotistic temperament and from the agitations of one whose aims are external and material. Woolman's aims were wholly impersonal, he seems to have been entirely free from ambition of any kind, and entirely absorbed in the pursuit of peace by the way of complete harmony with the divine will. That harmony he sought not only by self-surrender, but by active pursuit of righteousness. He was one of the most ardent anti-slavery men in those early days when the abolitionist was still in the distant future, and his gentleness gave his advocacy of the cause of the slave a persuasiveness denied most of his fellow-agitators.

"The inward peace which he so often and so happily calls stillness was not only his finest achievement, it was also the characteristic and shaping element in his style, imparting to his Journal a literary quality of the purest kind. Of this quality he seems to have been entirely unconscious, like many other men of genius he wrought better than he knew. Expression was, in his intuition, simply a means to an end which was neither artistic nor didactic, but the refinement and harmony of his nature were such that the free and simple utterance of his thought took on the quality of art and was instinct with its charm.

"There was a touch of Goldsmith's simplicity in him, although nothing of Goldsmith's humor. If to this simplicity are added transparent sincerity and an easy command of pure English, it is not difficult to understand why Charles Lamb said, 'Get the writings of John Woolman by heart'; nor why Henry Crabbe Robinson called Woolman 'a beautiful soul.' 'An illiterate tailor, he writes in a style of the most exquisite purity and grace. His moral qualities are transferred to his writings.' In the last sentence the charm of Woolman is clearly revealed, his nature was pure and harmonious, and his style, being essentially unconscious, reflected the qualities of his nature. It often happens that men become artists by moral rather than by technical discipline, and being great, bring forth the fruits of greatness in deep and beautiful unconsciousness. "The natural man loveth eloquence," wrote Woolman, "and many love to hear eloquent orations, and if there is not a careful attention to the gift, men who have once labored in the pure gospel ministry, growing weary of suffering and ashamed of appearing weak, may kindle a fire, compass themselves about with sparks, and walk in the light—not of Christ who is under suffering, but of that fire which they, going from the gift, have kindled, and that, in hearers, which is gone from the meek suffering state into the worldly wisdom, may be warmed with this fire, and speak highly of these labors. That which is of God, gathers to God, and that which is of the world, is owned by the world."

"The Journal is not a great piece of literature, but it has a quality which separates it from nearly all the writing which preceded or immediately followed it in the colonies. With Jonathan Edwards and Benjamin Franklin, John Woolman may be counted as possessing the literary gift in colonial times, and making a contribution of enduring interest, not only to our literary history, but to our literature. It is interesting to note that the two pieces of writing which may be classed as literature which have come down from pre-Revolutionary days are autobiographies, but beyond similarity of form the Autobiography of Franklin and the Journal of Woolman have almost nothing in common."

EDUCATIONAL.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE.

On Fifth-day morning, Tenth month 8th, Dr. Appleton delivered a lecture on Constantinople. The enthusiasm characteristic of all Dr. Appleton's work made this subject doubly interesting. Learned in Greek manuscripts he was able to trace the growth and greatness of Byzantium through Christian and Mohammedan periods to the present day. In regard to the question, "What shall be done with Constantinople and Turkey?" Dr. Appleton considered that this rich city should again become the Greek metropolis which it was before the Renaissance.

On Third-day the Friends' Central School Club held its first meeting. Much enthusiasm was manifest and it is expected that some good work will be done for Swarthmore by this club. The officers elected were: Frederic N. Price, president; Mary Janney, vice-president; Sarah Wood, secretary; Maurice T. Hansell, treasurer.

The Eunomian Literary Society held a very enthusiastic meeting on Sixth-day evening. The question for debate was "Resolved, that the new dormitory rooms should be charged for in accordance with size and convenience," and caused an animated discussion. The negative side obtained the decision. A very complete report on "The Postal System" was given by Henry Price. The committee to consider the expediency and advantages of uniting with the Delphic Literary Society, reported that having met a similar committee from the Delphic it was thought disadvantageous. A committee was appointed to look forward to the raising of money for a library building.

At a regular meeting of the Somerville Society there was introduced to its members an innovation in literary exercises, consisting of patriotic essays and recitations, together with the singing of "The Star Spangled Banner," and "My Native Land." Though short the meeting was very entertaining.

At the regular meeting of the senior class the elections resulted as follows: president, Harold W. Mowery; vice-president, Floyd H. Bradley; secretary, Martha K. Buyers; treasurer, Edward Bassett.

The class of 1905 elected the following officers: president, Frederic N. Price; vice-president, Ralph Jackson; secretary, Helen M. Carre; treasurer, William Linton.

Dean Bond in an address to the student body at a morning collection emphasized the point that the college man or woman should have the right companions. She called attention to the fact that parents write to her more about their daughters' companions than about their Greek and Latin.

On Tenth month 11th Dr. Trotter read a paper in which he showed the similarity between life-work and nature work; each is aiming at development and dispersal. One walks through the woods in fall and the stickers and burrs cling to his clothing, and the seed is carried off; coconuts fall in the sea and are planted in some foreign garden; all nature moves on perfectly. In the meeting Frances M. Robinson, of Richmond, Indiana, and Jesse H. Holmes spoke.

The second lecture of the College Lecture Course will be by Hamilton W. Mabie, on "Literature as a Personal Resource," on Fourth-day evening, Tenth month 21st, at 8 p. m.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.—The regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association was held on Second-day evening, Tenth month 12th, in the Y. F. A. Building. Several reports were read from those appointed to visit smaller meetings through the summer, and appreciation of this form of the Association's work was expressed.

Annie H. Hilborn read a paper entitled "The Blessings of Labor." Her hearers were all impressed with its beauty of thought and dignity of expression. That labor should be considered as a development and not merely as a money-making means, that all fine results of labor are equally inspired, whether from the hand of the artist or the day-laborer; and that simplicity in living and a right enjoyment of simple pleasures will increase the joy and blessing of labor. These were the leading thoughts of the address.

The rest of the evening was spent in suggesting plans for the winter's work of the Association. Edward C. Wilson, by letter, gave us some good ideas, followed by suggestions from J. Eugene Baker, Mary H. Whitson, Joseph C. Emley, and Arthur C. Jackson. More variety and breadth of program was encouraged, and at the same time, a further study of Friends' history and principles was urged. Personal responsibility was given as the keynote of successful meetings.

CAROLINE F. COMLY.

NEWTOWN, PA.—The Friends' Association held their first meeting of the season at the home of Aaron and Mary Anna Packer, on the 7th instant. The president, Evan T. Worthington, opened the meeting by reading the 15th chapter of St. John.

The first paper of the evening was read by William Smith in response to the question assigned him, "What Produced Quakerism?" Martin Luther prepared the way, he thought, for the conditions that produced Quakerism; and the force of the spiritual truths promulgated by Friends had additional strength given by the resistance and persecution of the times. Considerable comment followed the reading of this paper.

"Is Quakerism a vital Christianity? If not, what shall be substituted? If so, how shall it be made more effective?" was answered by Sarah J. Reeder. She said, "Those who understand the essentials of Quakerism must realize that it has in it the elements of vital Christianity, and that if Quakerism has failed to become such, individual inquiry is needed as to the cause of failure. The new Quakerism keeping firm hold of the fundamentals of the old, and finding new fields of labor, may have to step upon some of the customs and traditions of the past; but she felt an assurance that the younger people were feeling an increased interest in the welfare of the Society, and that the path to that 'greater illumination,' which shall guide them, will lead them into a knowledge and preparation of the work before this people in this day, and that we shall grow nearer and nearer to what might be called a vital Christianity." In reply to the portion of the question, "How shall it be made more effective?" Elizabeth G. Stapler read the remarks of Henry W. Wilbur at the Asbury Park Conference upon the needs of our Society.

George C. Hibbs read some portions from the paper of John William Graham, read at the same Conference, "The Quaker Ministry," in which he gave some of his own experience in the ministry, and made a strong plea for a more intelligent study of the Bible.

Esther Slack, in representing the Current Topic Committee, read from the Extracts of the Illinois Yearly Meeting.

The next meeting of the Association will be held at the Friends' Home on the evening of the first Fourth-day in Eleventh month.

S. T. R.

KENNETT SQUARE, PA.—The Young Friends' Association met at the home of Deborah Thompson, Tenth month 7th. The President, Sharpless W. Lewis opened the meeting by reading the 9th chapter of Ecclesiastes. Routine business was transacted, after which the literary program was taken up. A Biography of Sir Walter Scott, which had been carefully prepared was read by Richard Pennock. Anna Mary Martin gave a very interesting talk on the life of Samuel Janney. Helen Ruth Lewis recited the "Battle of Flodden Field," which she prefaced by a short account of Marmion and other characters mentioned in the poem.

Conrad Hines favored the Association with a voluntary. Delegates were appointed to attend the Conference to be held in Wilmington in the Eleventh month. Members responded to the roll call with sentiments from Scott. After a few minutes' silence the meeting adjourned to meet at the home of Harry K. Hicks, Eleventh month 4th.

M. A. F., Sec.

CAMDEN, N. J.—The Young Friends' Association met Third-day evening, Tenth month 7th, it being the first meeting after the summer vacation. The program of the evening was a paper prepared by Edward Roberts, Jr., on the first session of the Asbury Park Conference, which was devoted to the subject of "Religion." This paper was much appreciated, and called forth many remarks. After a brief silence the meeting adjourned to meet Eleventh month 3d.

FANNIE B. SCHEIBNER, Secretary.

EASTON, MD.—The Young Friends' Association held its opening meeting for this season at the home of the President Elizabeth N. Tylor, Tenth month 5th with an encouraging attendance of twenty-four. Among other business the president reported the public meeting held in the Town Hall, Easton, Fifth month last, under the care of our Young Friends' Association. This meeting, the outcome of a suggestion made by the Committee for the Advancement of Friends' Principles, was ably addressed by our Friend John J. Cornell of Baltimore and it was with regret that owing to inclement weather the meeting was not so largely attended as desired.

There being no prepared program for this meeting voluntary readings were greatly appreciated. Charlotte White responded first by reading the chapter on "Salvation," from the "Principles of the Religious Society of Friends." After a brief discussion Rachel Satterthwaite read "The Quaker's Creed" a beautiful article written by her mother Rebecca Tylor, many years ago. Helen C. Shieve read a poem entitled "The Two Villages" by Rose Terry Cooke, and Wilson M. Tylor read the poem "Do thy own Task" from "Lyrics of Quakerism."

A suggestion was made that those present give a "Current Event" to which many responded. After the usual sentiments the meeting closed with silence.

LAURA BARBER SHINN, Sec.

THE widow of Dwight L. Moody, the evangelist, died at East Northfield, Mass., on the 10th.

LITERARY NOTES.

THOSE who have admired the poems of Joseph Russell Taylor as they appeared in the magazines of recent years, will welcome this poet's first collected work. He entitles his volume "The Overture." (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.)

Never have our familiar birds been portrayed in more telling and beautiful phrases than here. Take this,—

"And look, the brown-thrush up and facing the storm
With a shaken jubilant splendor and storm of song
And more than the heart can bear!"

Or this, as lovely as the fading music of Keats' nightingale,—
"The bobolinks in twilight gray
Withdrawing, and now immortally far away,
Following the sunset."

How melancholy is this!

"I heard alone

The croak of passing ravens. Weird it fell,
And hoarse, and rusty, and like an old great bell
Tolled, and the dark drew on from height to height."

There is great stir and emotion through all the songs; only in the longer poems does the poignancy seem almost "more than the heart can bear." After such ardor and fervency it is restful to come on so sweet an avowal as this,—

"Yet song is sweetest when the song has died;
For I am fashioned of so fragile clay
As most to love the things that pass away, Though well I love the truer that abide."

Shelley and Keats and Tennyson have helped to shape the melody of this new lyric. There is more poetry in his volume than in a dozen of the usual books of the hour. The fine draughts of beauty, the sympathy with the myth-makers of old, and the fresh and exquisite phrasing, shown in this "Overture," are pledges of a nobler music yet to come.

J. R. H.

There are several articles of especial interest in this month's North American Review. Charles F. Thwing, President of the Western Reserve University, quotes a number of prominent business men to prove that a college training is an advantage in business. H. M. Somerville, formerly a Justice of the Alabama Supreme Court, states some of the causes of lynching, and says that there have been few cases of mob violence in Alabama since the laws of that State have authorized the Governor to call special terms for the speedy trial of criminals and to summarily remove sheriffs from office for neglecting to protect their prisoners. Fannie H. Gaffney, Honorary President of the National Council of Women, in an article based on a knowledge of the facts, shows that there is no monarchy in which the political position of women is better than in the United States.

The cover of McClure's Magazine is as gorgeous as the leaves of autumn and the contents are as attractive as the cover. Among other good things Walter Wellman describes an engineering project second only in magnitude and importance to the Isthmian Canal, the stupendous undertaking of the Dutch Government to drain the larger part of the Zuyder Zee, convert the rest of it into a great fresh-water lake, and reclaim from the sea a piece of land equal to one-fourteenth the present area of Holland. Though the work, which has hardly begun, will extend over some thirty-three years, each stage of it has been plotted and the cost estimated by the Dutch engineers, with the utmost exactness and thoroughness.

The author of "Books and Reading," in St. Nicholas defines a classic as "a book that lives because it says rightly what is worth saying, and is grave or gay as fits its purpose, living on because readers continue to love it. Or, to put the matter more shortly, a classic is a book that is too good to die." Howard Pyle concludes his story of the deeds of King Arthur with these words: "If so be they make you hink it is worth while to live a brave and true and virtuous life, doing good to those about you, and denying yourselves all those desires which would be ill for others and for yourselves for to yield to, then that which I have written hath not been written amiss."

Rex Christus: An Outline Study of China, published by The Macmillan Company (fifty cents) is a manual for the study of China as a mission field. It is a volume of some 150 pages and its object is "by no means to tell a little of everything that ought to be known about China, but rather so to present a few selected topics as to incite to a genuine study of the subject."

AUTUMNAL DAYS.

THERE is a finger beckoning in the hills, and a voice calling to the free spaces out under the sky. Happy are they whom good fortune has kept till now in the country, and they whom their own self-restraint or the dispensations of necessity—harsh in the enduring but benevolent in the retrospect—allow a vacation now in a season invested with the best and most compelling charms of the year.

The prophecy of a splendid autumn is in the air. Young oaks by the river side are purpling; ruddy wine is spilling over the tops of the sumacs; the maples are lighting their torches in the embers of dying summer. The birds have broken up house-keeping and are at frolic with their families in the woods. They hate to take up the flight to the South until they have seen the departing summer lay his finger on all out of doors and touch it into that wanton chromatic splendor into which autumn hereabouts is wont to flame.

Already the copious color is spread with full brush along the edges of roads and banks of creeks, and dabbled in great spots in the rowan—gentians, sunflowers, asters, marigolds; gay old-fashioned flowers riot in deserted gardens—zenias and salvia and dahlias.

There is satisfaction in the orchards; contentedness, with amplitude of fruitfulness in corn and cattle, in the fields. Chestnuts are ripening, and the hazels and walnuts; the eyes of the lads have spotted the likeliest yields. The acres lie at rest, their season's work accomplished, the corn awaiting the frost, with the pumpkins between the furrows.

The aisles through the woods are a little sunnier for the butternuts and a few other early-fading trees are beginning to lose their leaves; but down their solitudes the alien foot of man scarcely disturbs the busy squirrel. From the higher levels in the open country the reaches are a little broader; the hills, half hidden in haze, stretch away toward some longed-for Carcassonne; the roads wind, white, dotted with slow moving wains, or hayricks, of which every bridge takes toll.

Morning, these rare days, comes like a shout, like the sound of hunting-horn in the hills. There is a zest in the air; an ichor tingles in the veins. But the full day has its suspicion of melancholy—sweet, not sad—and the evening its unescapable solemnity, even with all that pomp of purple and crimson and gold piled up in the sky. For the sun, these last few days, has set the west aflame with a lordlier and unfamiliar splendor, which makes the heart almost ache; for it is like the mirrored effulgence of another world, where angels toss trumpets of brass and sing "Holy, holy, holy! Heaven and earth are full of Thy glory!"—[Philadelphia Ledger.]

One Lyncher's Confession.

IN Thomas Wentworth Higginson's little volume on Whittier recently issued in the English Men of Letters Series the chapter on "The School of Mobs" closes with this quotation from Field's Whittier:

"Once when he was passing through Portland, Me., a man seeing him go by, stepped out of his shop and asked if his name were Whittier, and if he were not the man who was stoned, years ago, by a mob at Concord. The answer being in the affirmative, he said he believed a devil possessed him that night; for he had no reason to wish evil either to Whittier or Thompson [the English anti-slavery speaker who also was roughly handled], yet he was filled with a desire to kill them, and he thought he should have done so if they had not escaped. He added that the mob was like a crowd of demons, and he knew one man who had mixed a black dye to dip them (the abolitionists) in, which would be almost impossible to get off. He could not explain to himself or to another the state of mind he was in."

CURRENT EVENTS.

DESPITE the fact that millions are being spent on "new law" tenement houses, there are in the Greater New York over 350,000 dark rooms without any windows opening to the outer air or even to another room which itself has windows opening to the outer air. Moreover, these rooms are located in over 40,000 different tenement houses scattered throughout the different boroughs. Under the law a large window, 3 feet by 5 feet, must be cut into each such room. A special and systematic examination of cellar living rooms in tenement houses is to be made so that those which do not conform to the law may be vacated. The Philadelphia Ledger commenting on this says: "The conditions of living in Philadelphia are in gratifying contrast with those indicated by the foregoing statements. The number of separate dwellings in Philadelphia is about 300,000, and tenement life, such as is typified in the windowless room, is scarcely known here. It is a sad commentary upon our boasted civilization that hundreds of thousands of the population of the chief American city are obliged to live in rooms which do not open to the outer air. It is the glory of the Quaker City that her families, with very few exceptions, live in separate houses, which are in fact and in name their homes, open to the air and the sunlight. Every city should require that a proper portion of every building lot shall be left vacant for court space for air and light. This matter does not receive attention in many instances until cities have become overcrowded. The decent housing of its inhabitants should be the first concern of every municipality, and it should receive attention when the municipality is young."

REPRESENTATIVES of the structural building trades including carpenters, hod-carriers, brick-layers and masons, painters and decorators, were in session at Indianapolis during the past week, the object of the conference being to devise some means of uniting the different branches of this important industry that has been so much distracted recently by labor troubles. A general plan for the creation of what will be known as the Structural Trades Alliance of America was agreed upon, which, it is estimated, will affect 1,000,000 men. The platform of principles sets forth the following objects of the organization:

First. The establishment of local and international boards of arbitration, to settle disputes as they arise without resorting to strikes.

Second. When necessary, to give international sympathetic support to all trades affiliated where local boards fail in their efforts to adjust differences.

Third. To safeguard, protect and watch over the interests of members of the organizations affiliated.

Fourth. To protect the autonomy of the several trades represented.

Fifth. To keep agreements with employers inviolable.

Sixth. To avoid and discourage strikes if possible, and to prevent internal strife and friction in the building trades industry.

Seventh. To oppose the formation of dual and rival bodies, demand their complete annihilation and assist only such unions as are affiliated with their respective or national or international unions conforming to this declaration of principles.

Eighth. To encourage and maintain fraternal relations with existing recognized central bodies and to emphasize the necessity for a centralization of organized wage earners.

At the sessions of the General Council of the Lutheran Church of North America at Norristown, Pa., on the 12th, the keynote was unification of effort, not only within their particular section of Lutherans, but of all the branches of the Lutheran faith. A representative of another main division of Lutherans, the General Synod, was present and made a plea for union of all Lutheran bodies, at least for conference respecting educational and mission work. The suggestion was made that a general conference on practical work of all bodies of Lutherans be called.

WAYNE MACVEAGH, Senior Counsel for the United States before the Venezuelan Arbitration tribunal, at The Hague, just before he sailed for New York from Cherbourg, said: "It is impossible to exaggerate the service President Roosevelt has rendered the cause of international arbitration in securing the presence at the same time of nearly all the nations of Europe before The Hague Arbitration tribunal, and inducing them to submit their contentions to its decision. Russia and Austria are represented by Judges, and Great Britain, Germany, France, Italy, Spain, Belgium, Holland and Sweden by Agents and Counsel. The dignity and authority of this court of justice and peace has thus been so universally recognized as to be no longer open to question."

At the first fall meeting of the Executive Committee of the Indian Rights Association, in Philadelphia, the Association's Washington agent, S. M. Brosius, who in a recent report first brought to light in a definite form the scandalous condition of affairs in Indian Territory, gave an account of his second visit to the Five Civilized Tribes. The committee expressed great pleasure with the President's selection of Charles J. Bonaparte to make a thorough investigation of the matters complained of in the Brosius report. It was said that ever since the publication of the report the Association has been receiving letters from residents of Indian Territory and Oklahoma, confirming S. M. Brosius's statements, and giving much additional information.

THE biography of Gladstone upon which John Morley has been at work for several years, was published on the 9th. The book is necessarily nothing less than a history of an important part of the Victorian Era. The author, himself prominent in national affairs during this period, had possession of the letters and papers of Gladstone, including a curious diary, and many extracts from them are published for the first time. Aside from its interest as history, had the book no other attraction than its style, its three volumes would still be noteworthy. But after all, perhaps the author's greatest achievement has been his revelation of Gladstone the man.

THE Irish Anti-Emigration Society, which has its national headquarters in Dublin, is to carry its mission into the United States, and has already enlisted the aid of several Irish organizations in this country, particularly the Ancient Order of Hibernians, the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick and the United Irish League. The first effort to be made by this organization is to stop the prepaying of passages from Ireland to America. The society has addressed an appeal to the leaders of the various Irish organizations in America and to prominent priests and bishops, declaring that Ireland is being depopulated to such an extent that foreign labor is beginning to invade certain provinces. It was generally expected that the introduction of the Land Purchase bill would have a tendency to stop the influx of Irish to this country, but as yet the statistics show an increase instead of an abatement.

THE correspondent of the London Times at Berlin says that Germany is preparing to give a deeper, wider and more technical instruction to customs officials, who in the future must acquire not only a superficial knowledge of the products of commercial industries, but also of chemistry, physics and mechanical drawing. It is also considered desirable that the officials be acquainted with the elements of finance, the commercial policy of various countries and the geography of commerce as well.

LODGING ACCOMMODATIONS AT PARK AVE. MEETING-HOUSE, BALTIMORE.

Friends desiring to avail themselves of the accommodations provided at Park Avenue Meeting-house, are informed that the rooms will be ready for occupancy on Sixth-day, the 23d of Tenth month, for those who have early engagements.

For those who cannot be accommodated at the meeting-house, or who may prefer to lodge elsewhere, board or lodging can be obtained in the neighborhood at a moderate cost. The committee is prepared to furnish the names of those who offer such accommodations.

In compliance with the arrangements made in 1902, Friends who desire accommodations at Park Avenue Meeting-house, are requested to make known their wish to the committee appointed in each monthly meeting, who will forward the names to the proper persons in Baltimore. The committee on entertainment at Park Avenue can receive applications only through the monthly meeting's committee.

This arrangement, securing, as it does, an equitable apportionment to each monthly meeting, has been found to give general satisfaction, and it is hoped that Friends will conform as fully as possible to the instructions which have been forwarded.

GOOD WORDS FOR 1903. XLIII.

We must be content now and then patiently to wait through the dark hours in seeming inaction, until the light again shines on our pathway. We must remember that what we are is of greater importance than what we do, though at the same time we must endeavor to find out our possibilities and how we can best realize them.

LIFE'S COMPLETENESS.

THERE are no lives unfinished, incomplete. God gives each man at birth some work to do, Some precious stone of strange prismatic hue To carve and polish until it may be meet To place within his temple, still and sweet. Ere that be done, the soul may not pass through The door to grander worlds, to aim more true, To wider life with love's sweet joys replete. And, if the working time be short, and earth With its dear human ties so hard to leave, Be sure that God, whose thought hath given thee birth, Still holds for thee the best thou can'st receive : Be sure the soul in passing through that door, Though losing much, gains infinitely more.

PREPARATION FOR VOCAL MINISTRY.

THE writer has been much interested in the discussion of the ministry among Friends, and desires to add a word from the West.

There seems to be a desire for a more broadly educated ministry, or rather more ministers specially fitted from an educational standpoint, yet at the same time there is a most decided feeling against a professional ministry. How to obtain the one and avoid the other, seems to be the problem set for us.

The need of ministry is obvious, for while one's own thought is essential to control the life, yet the mind is so constituted as to act largely by suggestion. Thought, clearly and plainly expressed, passes from mind to mind, finding its place in each, and if congenial, becomes a part perhaps of the thought of many persons and may influence many lives. Then, too, the profit of a meeting may be greatly increased by the centering of individual thought upon a suggested line.

Situations and conditions vary so much, however, that it would be difficult to apply any rule to all cases. There are silent meetings full of comfort and instruction, and meetings made vocal with expressions of little value and less applicability to the needs of their members; yet there are few cases where words fitly spoken will fail to add to their interest and profit. It has been stated that there is now a greater tendency to silent meetings than ever before, for the reason that the old active ministers are fast passing away and that few are coming forward to take their places. If this is true, this subject possesses a most vital interest to every one desiring the perpetuation of the Society. Reasons have already been given, but it seemed right for me to present a somewhat different one.

This is an era of reason, and the belief that God works in the world through natural law and not by special impulse, is constantly gaining ground. The supernatural is not given the place, nor is there so much "looking for a sign," as in the days of George Fox and the early Friends, and as a result the "moving of the Spirit," as then manifested in the deep religious exaltation that forgot time or place, overcame all reluctance or timidity and centered the whole thought upon the religious service in hand is not experienced in anything like so great degree. One great impelling power, therefore, is partially absent, and if its place is not supplied the result will necessarily be fewer ministers.

It is not because the Truth has changed or possesses less force than formerly, for it never changes, but remains the same from generation to generation. It is the knowledge, the appreciation of it that is constantly changing, and as it is the truth known to us that makes its impress upon us we could scarcely expect the changed conditions of the present to leave us unchanged or as Friends appeared two hundred years ago.

To very few indeed does the religious call come as it did in the days of Luther or Fox, and it is quite probable that few ministers could definitely locate the time or place of its coming. It doubtless comes in most cases so quietly and naturally as to preclude the idea of a special call; in a desire to render service to the Father; thankfulness for blessings received; a consciousness of the ability to render acceptable service; in response to the desire or approval of friends; a belief in the needs of society; a combination of influences difficult to analyze, and in other ways not usually considered as possessing the dignity of a special call. Any or all of these influences may be felt, but in the absence of what might be construed as the "revealing power" there will be delay in response, for fear of the lack of a Divine qualification. But so far as God works through natural law, the result would be such simple and natural incentives to the ministry as have been mentioned, so that no fear of lack of qualification should be felt if such promptings should be obeyed. Our disabilities proceed from no withholding of the Spirit, but are created only by our disobedience or carelessness in fulfilling the duties that life imposes upon us. God's line of communication with us is never closed or interrupted except by our own act, and if the flow of life or light is inadequate we have ourselves only to blame. We are often asking for a greater measure of the Spirit; we should strive for keener perception and greater ability to use what is already at our disposal. The work needed is in ourselves, and is one of preparation and adaptation. To illustrate this matter. Electrical energy existed in this world a thousand years ago in as great measure as it does to-day. It was awaiting the ability to use it—the Franklins, the Morses and the Edisons who would give time, skill and knowledge to the use of this wonderful power. It was not in the least a question of the existence of more energy, but of perfecting the means of applying and directing it.

In our desire to humble and demean ourselves by ascribing all to the Lord, do we not lose sight of many duties that we should know were ours to fulfill? In giving His endowment God certainly expected us to act for ourselves in many things, else the endowment would never have been given.

Intelligence and religious perception may not develop together, or on parallel lines, for there may be a high grade of intelligence and learning with little religious appreciation, yet it is well known that the religion of a people of low intelligence is generally crude, material, inclined to idolatry and lacking in spirituality, so that education is quite an important factor in religious progress. Friends take advanced ground in general educational matters, but practically leave out the spiritual, or any attempt at special training for the ministry, expecting the direct action of the Spirit to supply its absence, yet in all other duties of life fully recognize the need of training.

I would not say to any one to take up a certain line of study for the purpose of becoming a minister, but having the desire to so serve, I would say, "Heed it carefully, seek all the light possible, and strive to present the thought that comes clearly and forcibly." To ascribe a weak and poorly expressed thought to the prompting of the Spirit is to belittle and demean the Spirit.

I would take no empty vessel to the meeting but a mind is well stored with religious truth as possible, for to such only, in these "matter-of-fact" days will come the world possessing life and carrying conviction. The earnest minister will think and read much on religious subjects and thus store his mind with what may be profitable for instruction. He may not know when or where it may be appropriate to use it, but the time will surely come when it will prove to be the word fitly chosen and spoken.

T. P. MARSH.

Marshalltown, Iowa.

Not enjoyment, but rectitude, is the chief good, both in this life and the life which is to come. Enjoyment flows from rectitude; but the fountain is higher and purer than the stream. Enjoyment is often an end unworthy to be sought. Rectitude is always to be desired above all things.

OUR DUTY TOWARD FIRST-DAY SCHOOL WORK.

Read at Concord First-day School Union at Goshen, Pa., Tenth month 17th, by Lewis W. Brosius, Superintendent of Wilmington, Del., First-day School.

WILMINGTON FIRST-DAY SCHOOL has been very recently reopened after the usual summer vacation, and is not fully organized, and in shape to do as efficient service as we hope to be able to accomplish a little later on.

We have, given to our hand, as material wherewith to work, a very bright and interesting group of girls and boys, and it is our sincere desire that our officers and teachers may have the needed patience and determination, to so mould this material, that it may develop into the best and fullest womanhood and manhood.

While the intellectual training is largely obtained in week-day schools, and the moral development most powerfully influenced by the home; it is probable, that in these days of less rigid requirement of meeting and church attendance, and a falling off in the practice of regular family worship, that an increasingly larger proportion of our young people get their strictly religious ideas formed from impressions received in the First-day and Sunday-schools.

If this is the case, how important it is that those who are engaged in this work should realize the importance of doing it thoroughly, earnestly, conscientiously.

The questions of intellectual training, deportment, and morals must of course claim our most careful attention, as they should that of all who have to do with the care and training of children at all times, but the one hour of the seven days, is such a small part of the child's life, than we can hope to do no more than supplement in a small degree the training of the home, the week-day school and the play-ground.

But in the First-day School, the children are gathered to learn of the spiritual life, of our relations to our Creator, and of our reasons for our religious beliefs,—subjects that do not come up in the day schools, and are of such a nature that they are seldom discussed among themselves, and are, I fear, increasingly neglected in our homes.

It has been the testimony of too many of our own members, that they have grown to manhood and womanhood, with excellent moral training, and every intellectual opportunity, yet with very indefinite ideas of religion, and practically no clear comprehension of the belief generally held by their own Society. What knowledge they have has been obtained, rather by absorption, than by regular systematic instruction.

This ought not to be. While the First-day schools cannot wholly supply the want, they can do a great deal to help in the matter; and while the responsibility belongs to the whole membership of our society, the burden falls on the few, who through love, duty or other motive, are willing to assume the responsibility of organizing and carrying on these schools.

It is very important that this work should be well and thoroughly done, and it is well that we should consider frequently the requirements and see if we are measuring up to them. While the workers are almost all actuated by motives of love, it is important for the sake of the child, that the very few instances of misdirected zeal should be gently but firmly restrained.

It is important that all officers and teachers should be good examples of regularity in attendance, and where absence is unavoidable, that the performance of the duties should be arranged for beforehand. Neglect of this usually means that the lesson of that day is practically lost, as it is impossible for a substitute, provided on the spur of the moment, to do the best work for the children. This same objection applies to tardiness.

It is important that there be a well-defined course of study in the mind of the teacher. The consideration of this subject opens a very wide field—too wide to dwell on here, further than to emphasize the thought that the object sought is not merely to entertain and interest the children, which may be necessary sometimes in the case of small children, but to keep constantly in mind the imparting of definite religious instruction and the building up of Christian character.

It is important that the teachers should always be fully prepared with the lesson.

We know that many—perhaps most of the teachers in our schools are women and men, whose lives are full of work, hard work, yet the importance of this work is such, that if time presses, some pleasure should be denied, a substitute provided, or some less important work omitted, rather than fall short here.

Finally it is important that our members who are not teachers and officers should be ready and glad at all times to give the help and encouragement that are so helpful and necessary, in order that the teacher may accomplish the best work and the greatest good by regularly and punctually attending the schools, by cheerfully and willingly substituting when needed, by showing interest in the children's work and progress, by giving the teacher the helpful word, by striving to increase and broaden their own knowledge, by attending and participating in the business meetings.

We have not all the same gifts, but every one who can leave home is needed in some capacity, so that as individuals, and as a society we may grow in spiritual knowledge and prove faithful stewards in the training of the young entrusted to our care.

A CHRISTIAN is of no sect. He can dwell in the midst of sects and appear in their services, without being attached or bound to any. He hath but one knowledge and that is Christ in him. He seeks but one way, which is the desire always to do and teach that which is right; and he puts his knowledge and willing into the Life of Christ. He sighs and wishes continually that the will of God may be done in him and that His Kingdom may be manifested in him. His faith is a desire after God and Goodness, which he wraps up in a sure hope, trusting to the words of the promise, and lives and dies therein.—[Jacob Boehme, 1575.]

For Friends' Intelligencer.

A WHITTIER PILGRIMAGE.

PART II.—AMESBURY.

THE house in Amesbury which the Whittiers bought, and to which they removed in 1836 is on Friend Street, probably so called because the Meeting-house stands on it. It is a two and a half story frame house, differing in no important detail from its neighbors and opposites up and down the street. As we approached we found Samuel T. Pickard, who married Whittier's niece and who was Whittier's biographer, and now occupies the house, superintending some garden work. With a hearty welcome he ushered us in. The first room on the left was being papered and "done up" and electric light was being installed. The furniture from it was consequently scattered around in various places. Samuel T. Pickard first showed us the little parlor room on the right which was filled with associations of the poet. Here, temporarily, was the desk on which "Snow Bound" was written. In the corner was a group of statuary, composed of Whittier and Henry Ward Beecher, who are standing at the rear, and William Lloyd Garrison, who is sitting while talking to a slave.

Over the mantel is an oil painting of his mother. There is a portrait of his sister Elizabeth and in another frame portraits of all, or nearly all, the characters who figure in "Snow Bound." Then there are numerous groups of pressed flowers made by Lucy Larcom. Here too is a table made from a slab from the Borton Elm, with a pedestal from the poet's mother's spinning wheel. There are bound volumes of the Pennsylvania Freeman, of which Whittier was editor 1837-1840.

Across the hall and at the rear of the room which is being papered is the "garden" room, with its sunny, cheery outlook over the garden. This was Whittier's work-shop, and it is to-day just as he left it. In the rocking chair by the low window, dozing in the sun, was a cat, now fourteen years old. Whittier was particularly fond of yellow cats, which was the color of this one. Standing in the corner was the favorite cane, a silver capped one made from a beam from Pennsylvania Hall. Although he had many canes given to him at different times some of them with gold heads, this was the stick he preferred and usually carried. It is of it that his stirring poem "The Relic" is written, and this stanza portrays the feeling of affection he had for it:

"And even this relic from thy shrine,
Oh holy Freedom! hath to me
A potent power, a voice and sign
To testify of thee;
And, grasping it, methinks I feel
A deeper faith, a stronger zeal."

In the closet was the familiar high silk hat, which on trial fitted exactly the writer's head. But what a difference in the contents! Whittier always wore a straight collared coat, and we were informed after his residence in Philadelphia, he always ordered his coats from the same Market Street firm of Friendly clothiers, and they were made and forwarded to him without the least change in style and measurement for over fifty years.

Samuel T. Pickard showed us the first daguerreotype portrait of Whittier and many other pictures and letters of interest. Within a day or two during the tearing out for the electric light wires, several letters were found back of the partition, which from their date, 1848, showed that they had been in their hiding place ever since that time, the house having last been altered in that year. One to Whittier from Henry B. Stanton, of particular interest as showing the important position which Whittier held in the political world and also of interest because it was scribbled over with the verses of poetry in process of construction, was presented to the writer as a souvenir of our visit. Then too Samuel T. Pickard wanted us to help ourselves to a book from Whittier's library and after many searchings and changes of mind, we selected the Discipline of New England Yearly Meeting, published in 1828, as being probably a book belonging to the poet's father and mother as well as to himself. In it Samuel T. Pickard pasted a book plate stating it was from the library of John G. Whittier.

We were also shown Whittier's bed room, over the garden room, which too has been preserved as when last occupied by him.

It would be impossible to retell all the many incidents and stories which Whittier's biographer told us. One little fact was particularly interesting. In the photograph album the poet with pen or pencil had marked in a few curls on the foreheads of those of his women friends and relations where he thought the hair was too plain or worn too high. It did not improve the appearance of some of them, but our informant said Whittier liked them best this way.

After leaving the house we visited the Union Graveyard, and there in the section reserved for Friends and enclosed with a well kept arbor vitae hedge were the graves of the Whittier family. Whittier's stone, while somewhat larger than our discipline allows, was a simple marble stone with his name and the dates of birth and death. Here also are buried his sisters, his father and mother and Uncle Moses and Aunt Mercy, who are mentioned in "Snow Bound." In a corner of the enclosure is the grave of his brother and of his niece Elizabeth Whittier Pickard.

All around Amesbury are points of interest in connection with the poet's life, and one interested could spend a week in tramping over the beautiful country. Five miles across the hills and down the Merrimac River is Newburyport, the birthplace and home of William Lloyd Garrison and where Whittier in later life temporarily made his home.

C. F. J.

It was said by one of Elizabeth Fry's sisters that the two prominent features of her character were enterprise and benevolence.

WHEN the world opens to you as a plan of God, when all existence is vocal with his meanings, when his intentions thread the universe so that he who reads human progress, in its largeness or in its littleness, reads God's will,—that is "seeing God."—[Phillips Brooks.]

NEW TESTAMENT LESSON.—No. 38.

JAMES.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Humble yourselves in the sight of the Lord and he shall exalt you.—James, iv., 10.

Before study of Lesson read James, i., 12-18; ii., 1-9; iii., 1-12.

We must now turn from the work and writings of Paul to the progress of events and of thought in the mother church at Jerusalem. For we have preserved in the New Testament not only the letters of the apostle to the Gentiles, but also several from the leading men of the church of the twelve apostles. We must turn back also in time to a period preceding Paul's missionary labors, and not far removed from the beginning of his work in Antioch. It will be remembered that the church at Jerusalem had, like all the early Christian churches, a very loose organization. There was a committee to look after the wants of the poor; there were elders—probably self-appointed—who considered the policy of the church and decided its course; and, above all, there were the apostles set apart, not officially, but by their experience and personal relations with Jesus. With them soon came to be classed the "brothers of the Lord" (I. Corinthians, ix., 5), including James, Jude, and possibly Josias and Simon as well (Mark, v., 3). James, indeed, after the death of James, son of Zebedee (Acts, xii., 2), seems to have become in a way the head of the church at Jerusalem. For we find him apparently making the final decision in the question of the Gentile converts (Acts, xv., 13-21), and mentioned even before the leading apostles (Gal., ii., 9), and receiving Paul at the head of the elders on the occasion of his last visit to Jerusalem (Acts, xxi., 18). It is to be remembered that during the whole apostolic period Christianity in Jerusalem, at least, was one of the many Jewish sects. We have reason to think that the brothers of Jesus did not ally themselves with his followers until after the crucifixion. But we can hardly doubt that they, and most of those drawn by the teaching of the Master, were of the class farthest removed from the strict "legalists." To them the law was not a talisman, an oracle, a code to be obeyed in the letter, so much as a help toward purity of life, a guide to righteousness. Their use of the Law, in other words, was devotional rather than legal. It was such as these that had followed John, and after his death turned to Jesus, with no sense that they had left Judaism behind them, but rather that they had advanced toward a more perfect obedience to the spirit of its requirements. So James seems to have been held in high regard by both Christians and other Jews of Jerusalem. It is probable that he lived "much as one under a permanent Nazarite vow" and in this "we may picture him as highly representative of Palestinian Christians" (Bartlett).

James had caught, like most of the leading disciples, the "sweet reasonableness" of his greater brother. We have seen how moderate was his judgment in the matter of the Gentile Christians already referred to (Acts, xv., 14-21); and on the other hand we may feel that his attitude toward his fellow Jews was not different from that of John, the Baptist, or of Jesus himself—"hoping against hope that the obdurate majority would finally yield obedience" (Bartlett). It was in this spirit that he wrote the letter which bears his name, probably about the year 44. It was addressed "to the twelve tribes which are of the dispersion," a people not unknown to a dweller in Jerusalem, since there was a constant movement among all foreign Jews to and from that center of their faith.

In this letter we find a beautiful Christian exhortation dealing with certain characteristic evils of that time, and, indeed, of all time. Let us all endure temptation, rejoicing in the strength given us to withstand it. Avoid undue deference to wealth; it is not an evidence of worth, and may often be due to extortion or sharp practice. Fulfill "the royal law" of love. Speak and act as responsible men—men "to be judged by the law of liberty." Faith which consists of mere acceptance is of no value; the very devils believe. Mere assent to a theory of life will not clothe the naked or feed the hungry. "Faith apart from works is dead." "By works is a man justified, and not only by faith." There are those who attempt to set James against Paul in the matter of "justification by faith." Such critics fall again into the error, so often referred to, of reading a letter or a direct address as if it were a scientific treatise. The two writers are presenting the opposite sides of the same truth. Paul said in effect that works without faith is dead. A man may not be made righteous by going through a prescribed course of conduct, by obeying a code of laws. Yet is his righteousness made evident by his conduct; since it is death to sin he will sin no more. James says that a mere assent does not make man righteous, however correct his opinion may be, since faith appears in conduct. The two are wholly in accord.

The writer continues: Beware of the unruly tongue; it is small, but it does much mischief. Avoid faction, seek for meekness, gentleness and peace. Conflicts among you come from your human desires. Do not judge one another, but leave judgment to God. Be direct and truthful in your conversation, not hesitating to confess to each other your failings. Such is about the scope of the letter of James, so simply and clearly expressed, with such loving earnestness and enthusiasm that we can almost venture to recognize the relationship with him who taught as never man taught. The letter returns more than once to warnings against the fear of or love of wealth. These are also sins of our time. They are not sins of the rich any more than of the poor; they are no uglier among the wealthy than among those in poverty. The evil is fundamentally that of a false standard. The attainment of riches is not an evidence of virtue or vice, of wisdom or folly, in the large sense, of simplicity or luxury, of meanness or generosity. Riches come by accident, by skill, by abilities of various kinds, by fraud, by theft, and in many other ways. Our time has come too largely to make attainment of wealth a kind of standard of success, or more, a patent of nobility. There is much evil and dangerous demagogery abroad in connection with riches, all based on a false view of its place and importance.

It is a part of our duty as a society to insist upon character as the only standard of success; to maintain our relations with men on that basis and no other; to neither truckle to the wealthy on the one hand, nor denounce them as a class on the other.

VALUE OF SILENCE.—Living happily in close relations with any one calls for the exercise of the highest kind of diplomacy, for it necessitates being brought into such close touch with that other's moods, which may not be yours at all, and in becoming in some sense a part of that person as he of you. It is equally true whether the relation be business or social. There is but one way of keeping everything moving smoothly, and that is to overcome the friction with the oil of silence—even the silence that says disapproval is better than words from an irritated mind. It does not leave stings to be cured afterward. The more intimate the relation the greater the need of good breeding, and it is never well bred to get into an argument or to say unkind things. No degree of relationship or intimacy justifies in telling needlessly unpleasant truths. If they become necessary to be told there is a way to do this in a spirit of love at the proper time. Surgery of the soul may be imperative, and when it is it is time enough to try it.—[Gathered.]

THEY who complain most about the burdens of work and duty laid upon them are commonly not the hard workers. These latter commonly refuse to admit that they are overworking. In fact, those who live properly in other ways seldom do suffer from hard work. When he was president of Harvard College, Cornelius Felton said that he had never known a student to break down merely because he worked hard.

IN any family circle the gentle influence of one loving soul is sufficient to breathe around it an unspeakable calm; it has a soothing power like the shining of sunlight, or the voice of doves in the evening. . . . Do not fear that your influence will be small: no influence is small: but even if it were, the aggregate of small influences is far more irresistible than the most vigorous and heroic of isolated efforts.—[Selected.]

TAKING UP THE CROSS.—Taking up one's cross means simply that you are to go the road which you see to be the straight one; carrying whatever you find is given you to carry, as well and stoutly as you can, without making faces, or calling people to come and look at you. Above all you are neither to load or unload yourself nor cut your cross to your own liking. Some people think it would be better for them to have it large; and many, that they could carry it much faster if it were small; and even those who like it largest are usually very particular about it being ornamental, and made of the best ebony. But all that you have really to do is keep your back as straight as you can; and not think about what is upon it—above all, not to boast of what is upon it.—[John Ruskin.]

HARMFUL DIVERSIONS.

THE query about attending places of amusement of a hurtful tendency is very familiar to the ears of our readers. The answer returned to it is frequently a vague one. The desire to answer truthfully a question which often the overseers from lack of knowledge are unable to answer fully, is manifested in the use of such expressions as "most Friends," or "some Friends," are careful in this respect. The perfunctory way in which the query is answered seems to indicate that it is not doing all that it is intended to do in calling the attention of Friends to the matter of diversions and a careful consideration of the tendencies toward good or evil which they are liable to foster. With this, as with most of the other queries, the important thing is not so much the collective answers as the individual use of the query. It makes comparatively little difference whether we have carefully tabulated statements about such matters as this, but it makes much difference whether each member puts the query to himself whenever he turns aside from the routine of daily work and seeks change and recreation.

Much prejudice has existed in the past, and perhaps still exists, against certain forms of diversion which some of our members conscientiously feel that they may engage in, and we are largely so busy either enforcing our prejudices or combating those of other people, that we often fail to make the application of the query to all our recreative interests. Theatre-going is among the debatable pleasures for Friends. One extreme holds that it is necessarily demoralizing, the other that the dramatic art is a great gift committed to man, and that to see the works of immortal genius put upon the stage is a means of culture as well as a source of pleasure. It is not our purpose to take issue with either view, but to call the attention of Friends who wish to participate in this form of amusement to the desirability of close inquiry in each case of attendance as to the motive that prompts them to go, and as to whether the spectacular effects they wish to witness belong to the realms of immortal genius, and whether the actors are personifications of a noble art. Often persons of high standing attend the theatre, not because there is anything being played there which will instruct or inspire them, but because they wish to be amused, or to take a friend to some place of recreation, and the program of a theatre offers a convenient attraction. A specious form of reasoning makes easy the road we wish to travel, by ending our deliberations about any debatable matter with the conclusion, "At all events, there is no harm in it."

We feel doubtful about the existence of negations in things that are powerfully attractive. They draw attention either by appeal to "the higher impulse which inspires," or to "the meaner instinct which enjoys," and is not always very particular about what it enjoys. We appeal to Friends to be guided in their indulgence in this form of pleasure by the higher rather than the lower instinct, and to consider dispassionately whether the general tone and influence of the modern theatre is not such that Friends need to be very guarded in the encouragement of this form of amusement.

The multiplication of suburban parks and pleasure resorts, every yard of whose walks is lined with amusements designed to be financially profitable to their promoters, makes it necessary for Friends again to use the query framed by the wisdom of our fathers. Most of these amusements, for which each participant pays a few cents, seem essentially harmless, yet it need scarcely be doubted that the tendency of amusements designed not to instruct nor soothe the nor stimulate, but to catch the careless eyes and ears of the aimless masses of humanity who throng these resorts, is a demoralizing one; and it should be worth while for Friends to forego the novel sensations of scenic railways and toboggan slides for the sake of discountenancing a form of amusement which impoverishes the poor, is the enemy of thrift, and a disturber of the capacity and taste for those natural pleasures which a country park ought to provide.

Friends resident in country neighborhoods do not have the same class of seductive amusements awaiting them at every hand, but they are not free from care and grave responsibility concerning the diversions which are attractive to their children. Out-of-door dances and social parties in public halls whither guests are bidden who would never be invited to the homes of Friends, offer a form of temptation which many parents find it hard to withstand for their children. The growing practice among Friends of allowing their children to participate in all such social pleasures as are common in their neighborhood, the extremely youthful age at which many of them are allowed to be away from home for social pleasure without the care or protection of any person of mature years, and the tendency toward extending such pleasures far into the morning hours, makes it timely to ask all parents weightily to consider what harmful diversion really means, and to make earnest and continued efforts to turn the desires of their children toward the ample field of healthful and suitable pleasures which are so abundantly provided in this generation.

In general the test for harmful diversions may be made according to the standards of individual conscience, and the effect upon society at large. We do not live unto ourselves alone, and even though a thing is apparently promotive of no evil tendency in us, we nevertheless need to have due regard to the admonition "Eat no meat, and drink no wine, nor do anything whereby thy brother stumbleth or is made weak." When certain forms of diversion seem demoralizing to society at large, the duty of all good men to their fellow-men is to abjure for themselves that which leads others astray.

SHEPPARD.—At her home, Oak Park, Illinois, Tenth month 9th, Alvanetta F. Sheppard, wife of Thomas Sheppard, and daughter of Allen and the late Phebe Ann Flitcraft, in her 47th year.

She was always an interested member in the various concerns of the Society, being particularly devoted to the First-day School cause, in which she was for many years engaged. She loved and cherished the young spirits with whom she was associated, and was often thoughtful in gathering such around her in a Christian home. Unselfish, generous and loving while health continued, and when it was her lot to spend many weeks in extreme suffering she was sustained in patient submission, then, at last, with peaceful overshadowing of Divine Goodness, she met death calmly and sweetly.

NOTES.

The American Friend reports a unique meeting held for mothers and their babies at the Friends' Meeting-house at Lynn, Massachusetts. The rising generation was well represented, the little ones ranging in age from 2 months to 3 years, and they, taken together with the parents and friends, made a large and pleasant company. The meeting was a preliminary one to a more formal service and consecration by the meeting, to take place by request of the parents. It was hoped that the importance of associating the children with the membership of the church would be felt. A social hour followed the meeting, and light refreshments were served. All who attended were much pleased with the entertainment, and much good should result from the work thus inaugurated.

It has long been a custom for Friends of both branches to attend the religious meeting at the Home for Aged and Infirm Colored Persons, at 44th street and Girard avenue, Philadelphia, on the fifth First-day of the month as often as there is a fifth First-day. The time has been when many Friends have attended these meetings, but of late, owing to the passing away of some who have been concerned in this service and to the feebleness of others the attendance has grown smaller and sometimes there have been but one or two or even none present. Some of the aged ones in the Home who, it appears, value these opportunities, have spoken to Friends about the matter, fearing that the meetings were to be discontinued. Perhaps some whose attention has not before been turned in this direction may feel like taking up this service in the place of those who have come to the time when they must drop out. The next fifth First-day will be Eleventh month 29th. Due reminder will be given hereafter in the INTELLIGENCER in the Calendar of Events of Interest to Friends.

William Ingram, of Telford, Bucks county, Pa., father of William S. Ingram, of Philadelphia, returned on the 10th from a three months' visit in England, Scotland and Ireland. He was met by Friends everywhere with much kindness and cordiality. Traveling alone, the return passage was a trying one, the steamer—The Philadelphia—having a rough voyage during the recent severe storm.

The Pennsylvania Peace Society, at its last session, decided to appeal to all the churches of Philadelphia to cooperate with them in endeavoring to remove from the streets the obnoxious posters there displayed, the Society of Friends, through their Philanthropic Committees, having already taken up this concern.

At Chicago's Executive Meeting of Friends, held Tenth month 18th, Jonathan W. Plummer, Hannah A. Plummer, Clifford Ellis and Emma Hollway were among those who spoke in the public meeting.

COMMUNICATION.

THE LESSON LEAVES.

I HAVE been interested in reading the letter of Jesse H. Holmes in last INTELLIGENCER in regard to Friends' Lesson Leaves. I do not think it would be best to make the lessons uniform for all grades, and I think it would be a disadvantage to use the selections of the International Series. I take my views in a measure from the First-day School here in Wilmington. We have pupils from four years old up to twenty, a majority of them not Friends, and some of them used to attending Sunday Schools where literal reading and evangelical explanation of the Bible prevails. Shall we take these little four-year-old children through the theological speculations and dogmatical mysteries, and tangles, of the International Series? Is there any sentimental fitness why the whole of such a school as ours should be working on the same topic? Is it not best to give milk to babes and meat to strong men? If we have exercises (opening or closing) in which all minds can engage to profit, those exercises must be on very simple broad ground on which all can unite—the beauties of nature; the grandeur of creation; the goodness and love of God; the love of and kindness to our fellows; truthfulness, honesty, integrity, purity; the teachings of Jesus; no dogmatical or doctrinal argument. So many different minds in various stages of religious progress cannot profitably be engaged alike. This must be left to the teachers. Adapt the lesson to the comprehension of the class. Never knowingly distort the meaning of the Scriptures. Teach what you believe to be the Truth; if that is in any way not suitable don't touch the subject. I visited a class of small children lately and was instructed myself, and felt that the little ones were both interested and instructed. The teacher had some mustard seed and a picture of a mustard bush. The lesson was given simply, and eyes brightened and interest beamed in their faces; each one took some seed to try if it would grow. The older and more advanced pupils can profit by an advanced study of the Bible to get at the truth of its history and chronology and morality. It should be studied in the light of advanced knowledge and enlightenment. Whittier says:

"Doubts to the world's child-heart unknown Question us now from star and stone."

We cannot go on worshipping the "letter that killeth but must be under the influence that giveth life." George Fox said, "I read the Scriptures that spoke of Christ and of God, yet I knew Him not but by revelation, as He who hath the key did open." Our early Friends adhered to this ground that immediate revelation was the highest authority by which all Scripture and all opinions and dogmas are to be tried. Truth is the standpoint of criticism, and no ancient record is too sacred to come under its scrutiny. Every truth is holy, and is a revelation from God.

"God is near us now as then,
His force of love is still unspent,
His hate of sin as immanent."

Wilmington, Tenth month 18th.

D. FERRIS.

To bring to each other sane friendship between people who love each other, respect for each other's individuality is of course necessary; but such respect is, after all, an abstract thing, and cannot be cultivated in a moment. While waiting for it to struggle through our stony egotism, there is one thing we can do; we can vow that unless duty seriously and lovingly demands it, there shall be no unmasked criticism between people who love each other! Think how it would make for peace if domestic criticism were forbidden at every breakfast table. Think of our own happiness if our brothers and sisters will stop telling us unpleasant truths!—think of their happiness if we could refrain from enlightening them as to their dress, or manners, or beliefs.—[Margaret Deland, in Harper's Bazar.]

THE PARENT, THE CHILD—AND GOD.

[An address by William C. Gannett, author of "Blessed Be Drudgery," "The House Beautiful," etc., before the recent National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches, as reported in the Christian Register.]

ALL men and all women are parents in heart,—some of us with children in the flesh, some of us only with dream-children, but not really unchilded by that. So I shall speak as if we all belonged to one class, that of parents; and I want to speak practically.

The parent is a trustee. That is perhaps his most significant title. Jesus, in the story, took a little child, set him in their midst, and said—you know what. That is what God is doing every moment all over the earth. He is taking a little child, setting him in the midst between a man and a woman, and saying, "Hold him, keep him, tend him for me. He is my boy, she is my girl: tend them for me." The wondrous thing intrusted to us is the crown of the visible creation,—a body, a mind, a heart, a will, a conscience, a soul, all of them feeble, all of them helpless, all of them vital through and through, all with a destiny of growth, part perishable, but even this a miracle and essential; part, as we think, imperishable.

And each parent is a joint trustee for this living miracle. It comes indelibly stamped as theirs, stamped with their features, stamped with their aptitudes, stamped with their predispositions. Our child looks into our face, and awes us with the sense that it is we two in composite miniature. Nature itself has inscribed our name on it. It is a vast dignity, the greatest conferred by Nature. It is a vast responsibility, the weightiest with which man is burdened. For the parent is God's vicegerent and visible representative on earth. Toward this little soul he is the God creating, for God will continue its making through him. He is the God providing, for God will be Providence to it mainly through him; here in Nature are the materials, but the parent is the one to apply them. He is the God educating, for here in the child are the powers in the germ, and here in society the teachers and text-books; but he, the parent, is to make all the connections. He, under God, is fate to the child. Under God,—under God! God not the absentee, but God present, watching, suggesting, securing in some sort his end by that wonderful method of his,—parental love. For, corresponding to the dignity and the responsibility of parentage, is a vast reward, even the joy of having a child, one's very own. No joy like that joy. This is the trustee's commission for services rendered,—the commission prearranged, sealed and secured in the very nature of the trustee,—the father's and mother's love for their offspring. When the little soul arrives on the time-shore, it lands on a mother's breast, and welcome is waiting! The wide world over, that welcome is waiting. The child itself is its own reward.

Now consider more closely this trustee's functions with reference to the soul of the child. The three I would speak of blend into one, yet they are in a measure separate and successive. These functions successively are, to be Image of God, to be Priest, to be Oracle.

First, then, as Image of God. The time does not last long, but there is a time when the mother and father are really as God's very self to the little soul. It images no other God. All that it knows of power, of wisdom, of goodness, of blessing, or of something to fear, is there by its side in its home. The arms that enclose it, the eyes that beam down to it, the voice that bids and forbids, are the arms and the eyes and the voice of the God that it names "mamma" and "papa." As yet there is nothing beyond. They are its little Supreme of authority and dignity and character. When it begins to hear the name "God," the name "Jesus," the names "Washington," "Lincoln," they all seem to mean somebody good and kind,—and it knows its own father is that. So all mix up together in this little one's mind, and one of his early problems in personality is, perhaps, "Which is the better, George Washington or papa or God?" During this time the parent, I say, is actually the Image of God to the child's mind. It does not last long, this time, only during the first three or four years of the life; and the parent exercising the function is almost unconscious of it. If we were conscious of it, we could not stand it. But for the time the function is a real one, and it is probably far more important to the child's after-notion and after-feeling of God than we dream. Happy we parents if, as those afterthoughts dawn, the child feels no great jar and break between its three-year-old and its ten-year-old theology, its three-year-old God and its ten-year-old God.

But soon comes our second relation to our child's soul. We are no longer quite the Image of God to him: he has found us out. He knows us better now. We are good, we are kind, he loves dearly and knows that we love him; but he knows there is a difference between God and us. And now arises our second function,—that of the parent as Priest. It is a blessed time for us now, even more blessed than the earlier, because now we are conscious of the function.

Several different opportunities of priesthood to our little boy's soul and our little girl's soul are going to be ours. There are those earliest altars of all, the mother's lap and the father's knee. There is that sacredest hour in a child's life, the bedtime hour, when all evening sanctities are concentrated in the quiet between a brooding mother-heart and a child-heart. The hour is Nature's confessional hour, and that place Nature's confessional closet between the child and its parent. Then is the little soul all open, tender, brimming with confidences and self-revelation. That is the hour of delight in the true mother's day, when her child's soul lies open to her love and her gaze and her holiest word. In the true father's day, also; for the father who loves his child or himself will not give it all to the mother. Now comes the teaching of the little rituals that the child yearns,—the lisping in words of the child-soul toward the other Mother-and-Father, the great Mother-Heart, the great Father-Hand, of its life.

Another of the parent's opportunities of priesthood is that of the family altar, so called,—the family altar, as it was called. Has any sanctity really gone out from our homes that that term and that practice are no longer familiar among us? The family altar! You still bow your individual soul, perhaps, to the dear Father at night or at morning; but from your home, where father and mother and the two or three little ones live as one unit of blessedness, one household of love, has the feeling of family thankfulness, family aspiration, family prayer, really gone, that we no longer have anything like the "family altar?" To some of us, as we now think of it, that custom in the mornings of childhood is the most lastingly tender memory that has come down through the years. The dear old custom is disused now, I will not say wholly, unwisely. But is nothing taking its place? Are we never together thankful to God, never together thinking of him, never together calling his name? Is the thought of him kept for the separate bed-chambers, and, for the rest of our home, love in abundance and ethics and character,—embodied religion, indeed, but, because embodied and organized, so largely unconscious,—but never a fresh "Thank God" uttered together, never an "Our Father" heard in the home? Why, three times a day there is a natural sacrament opportunity in every home, and three times a day a sacrament apt to be kept in a true one,—a sacrament almost informal, but conscious and tender and holy for those alive to the feeling of God. Three times a day the bread of God is broken for us; three times a day the wines of God are offered to our lips; three times a day father and mother and children gather close to each other, lovers all, hands within reach, with emblems of service, the helping to food and the sharing for necessary parts of the meal. And amid all this beauty of relation and action never a word to God and of God uttered together? Never the silent bowing of the head together to the Heart of it all? Never the lifting of the souls in a household thanksgiving, "Thank God we are here, are part of each other, and he part of us, and we part of him"? Oh, shame on our homes of the liberal faith if we, who have given over our fathers' old habits of family faith, have not in some way or other, simple, sweet, natural, replaced the old custom! It asks for only a moment of time; but that moment really kept, really lived, is more strengthful than almost any other in the whole day. It is the peace beforehand for the day's fight and worry and fret, the day's strain and tire. A moment's reading will do it, friends,—a few verses out of some Bible or a few lines out of some poem. And the tenderest way is for the child, when he is old enough, to come right to the father's or mother's side and do the reading himself, and then turn up the little face for the kiss that seals it all. Are you and I going to forego in our homes that moment of tenderness, God's kiss on us all? You young men and young women, with parenthood still in the distance, and you twos who, yet to be one, have not even greeted each other perhaps, let me tell you the easiest hour to begin the dear custom. It is when you and she, you and he, first enter your home to begin the "new life." The father of your childhood is away now, and the mother away: the new home is your very own, and you two are together, alone, in the sacredest hour of your life. God has blended you invisibly; now be you blended before him visibly by the sign of the bowed head and the word, or a conscious stillness of gratitude. Begin then and there the new life with the quiet moment at the breakfast meal. The tenderness of the night's silence behind you, the beauty of the morning's freshness around you, then and there, on your first wedded morning, begin the custom which, then begun, may last on into your children's lives as they come into your arms, and may bless those children unspcakably. It is easiest, then, to begin. Yet let none of us older belated ones think it is too late for us to begin that little family tryst with the God of our home.

There is a third opportunity for parental priesthood to the soul of the child. I am thinking now of the father's and mother's general habit of showing reverence for things reverend. For instance, is beauty sacred, as such, in the home? Are the holy and the ridiculous instinctively two, not one, in the household speech? Do love and death and sin and Bible and religion and "God" lie above the levels of jest? Is reverence felt for others' reverence, whatever its object? Or again, do the father and mother care that their child shall care for the church? that their child shall care for the Sunday-school? The former query I leave for others to urge, only saying that the child's interest in the church is almost sure to be no higher than the parent's. But do you know that most of us average parents are arrant ingrates toward one set of coworkers with us,—I mean, the Sunday-school teachers? Most of us, after the morning church service is over, go home; perhaps, after the long sermon, are glad that we can. But fifteen women, and two or three men with them, are not going home. They are going down into the other room to spend another hour and a quarter—with whom? With your children. At whose request? At your request, for you send the children to them. Did you ever thank the Sunday-school teacher of your child for that? A Sunday comes too unpleasant for church-going, or too pleasant, and you do not go. For the Sunday-school teacher no such Sunday ever comes: her loyalty to your child forbids. Did you ever thank the teacher for that? An hour and a half a week for forty consecutive weeks is her gift to you. Have you remembered to say anything to her about it? to show any interest in her work? to consult with her over it? to second her in it? Did you know that such seconding changes her teacher's task from a hard to a joyful one? and that, unless the home does second the Sunday-school heartily and continuously, it is apt to be almost fruitless of good to a child? Have you ever talked with your child's Sunday-school teacher, I say, about her work for the soul of your child? ever thanked her?

More important, of course, than any and all things besides, is our character and life as the children see us day by day in the home. I said that our functions of Image of God, of Priest, and of Oracle blend. That first equation of all, when we were the only image of God to the child's mind,—that old equation lasts in a sense, although it has dimmed, and the "only" is gone. I mean that his notions of God are still being shaped and colored by our characters. Words about him without character to match are soon felt as unreal by the little child-mind, so shrewdly detective. "God" is compact of ideals to us; and our child's ideals of duty, of honor, of justice, of disinterestedness, of tender love, are all saturated largely by our reals of these qualities. A father's sincerity often determines for life the ethics of his boy's theology; a mother's love, the depth and horizons of his faith in the Infinite Goodness. This is so well known that it need not be dwelt on, but it is more important for practical priesthood than anything else to be said. All mediatorship centres in this. We parents cannot teach more of God to our child than we have incarnated of God in ourselves. Remember nothing else that I say, but remember that we parents cannot teach more of God to our child than we have incarnated of God in ourselves.

Here are four or five ways, then, in which the mother and the father are the natural Priests to their child. And these ways, put together, determine the atmosphere of the home. The atmosphere of home,—that word tells the whole story. Let the atmosphere of its home be that of reverence and aspiraticn,—not merely of goodness, but of goodness aspiring; not simply of ethics in practice, but of ethics at worship,—and our child is pretty safe in its home. For it will be living in the light of God shining visibly through the parent's ideals.

A few words, now, of the parent's third function,—that which I called being Oracle to the child-soul. In Greek lands of old the oracle was the shrine to which men went to ask questions of the gods. A shrine corresponding to that belongs in each home,—a place where the little one can bring its quaint curiosities concerning the universe, asking for light. The child-soul, six or eight years on earth, is all a-flower with questions about God and itself, and the whence and the why and the whither of things. We do not have to wake the God-sense, Nature takes care of that: our part is only to guide, to enlighten, to educate it. And such deep-simple conundrums as our six-year-olds can invent,—levelling, of course, the wisdom of sages, to say nothing of ours! It must ask these questions of some one. Who is to answer them? Who, first, but the parent?

Suppose that he says, "I know not the answers myself, and I will say naught to my child," or, a more common way, "I have my opinions, my 'faiths,' if you please, but am not going to prejudice the mind of my child: he shall grow, and solve as he may his own problems." That parent is abdicated part of his parenthood. And abdicating in favor of whom? In favor of a nurse, of a Sunday-school teacher, of a Sunday-school book, of a novel, a newspaper, of the child's little playmates, of neighbors who are sure that they know and are only too faithfully anxious to tell, among the things they would tell being some of the last things in the world a parent of the liberal faith would like his child to believe. In society like ours the child is sure to be influenced, "prejudiced," one way or another. The question is not of influence or no influence, but only of whose? In heathen countries and famine times they sometimes "expose" the new-born babe to the mercy of the street or the wood. The parent who refuses to be, as well as he can, the "Oracle"—that is, the intellectual interpreter of God to his child—is "exposing" its soul to the street. It is pitiful, tragic. The child has a right to say, "Father, this is my home, you are my father: tell me your best!" Our best,—that is all. "As well as we can,"—no more is required. Give him your best thought of God and his goodness, whatever it be, saying always and humbly: "This is only my seeing: I, too, am a child. And we see more and better as long as we live, if we try to live rightly." That sort of answer serves both of the child's needs: it helps him with the life we have won; "prejudices" him toward the true and the beautiful as we discern it; and it teaches the open mind and the vision that grows. And the child by and by will twice bless us. Whereas the refusal to help teaches not the open mind, but indifference. And no blessing waits upon that. The parent owes the child body bread; he owes the child-mind reading and writing; he owes the child-heart love; he owes the child-soul his own thought of God, his best to the date of the asking. Instead of making our ignorance an excuse and exemption, we should make the child's ignorance a compulsion laid on us to so live that we shall have a good thought of God to give, when he comes to the Oracle.

But let us not think, after all, that it is mainly a conception of God that we owe him. The great thing is not a definition, but a feeling; not theology, but religiousness. Whatsoever we try to explain to our child, he is not going to see just the figure of God that we see. Nature not only wakes the God-sense, but takes care of the chamber of imagery, and sets out the quaint little mind-idols according to need, changing them with the years, yet following more or less our parental suggestions. In other words, it is not the outline of the God-thought, but the contents that we mainly should care for. Never speak the name "God" to your children without the dawn of a smile on your face, as if you were facing some beautiful thing, and you will do more for their souls than by the correctest theology. Make God stand for Goodness, for Love, for Holiness to them, and these "contents" of the God-thought will be carried over from outline to outline by them as they grow. Let us talk without fear in picture-words to them, in "anthropomorphisms," provided we also give hints that open escapes toward the Infinite for them. On the other hand, be not afraid of such hints, of such "abstract" words as "life," "light," "love," "truth," in speaking of God to them: be afraid not to use these. The child's mind is certainly a literalist: every idea presented to it turns to concrete picture and image. As truly, as truly, it is a Transcendentalist, even an "occultist." Trust your little Transcendentalist! He will understand your abstract terms almost as well as you do,—perhaps better. A mother I know would fain teach her boy no

"doctrine," but of course her fate came upon her. One night he asked from between the bedclothes who "God" was. She hesitated, and then, on the instant and on the inspiration, replied, "Wherever you see anything that is beautiful or good, you see God, dear." "Why, then God is in me, sometimes!" he answered right off. Could anything be more successful than that? Or analyze this other saying which another mother I knew kept in her heart: it shows how the little minds manage to lay hold of the transcendental, while tuning it into the concrete and homely. Jamie was seven years old, and had been taking his Saturday night's bath alone. Coming back to his mother, he told her he had been making up a new prayer in the tub: "Dear Father in heaven, take away my sins: squeeze them out of my soul, like squeezing water out of a sponge. Then take Truth gently up, and put her there; but still leave the soul open that she may fly in and fly out; that I may speak the truth. Dear Father in heaven, I cannot hear you answer my prayers, but I know thou dost. Good-night, dear Father." Sin, Soul, Truth, and inaudible Prayer-Answer,—but all in a bath-tub, and bird-flight! And he,—he predestinates just such psychological mix-ups, welcomes just such familiarities! Fear not, ye of little faith, your child can understand you; for God, who is teaching through you, is also, all the time, teaching his own deep things behind you.

Image, Priest, Oracle, to the child-soul,—even this it is to be parent, to the end that the soul of the little child shall grow God-like. I speak as to fellow-trustees.

EDUCATIONAL.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE.

On Fourth-day, the 14th inst., President Swain spoke at the dedication of the "Institute for Colored Youth" at Cheyney, Delaware county, Pa.

At a special meeting of the Eunomian Literary Society, the committee appointed to confer with the President in regard to advancing the interests of literary work and to consider the making of the Eunomian reading room more exclusively for its members, reported the room to be locked part of the day. The society adopted the following rules: 1. The room shall be open to the public from 2 to 4 p. m. and closed on First-day; 2. The library shall be open to the public from 1.30 to 2 p. m. on Sixth-days. The President consented to these conditions. From this radical change it is hoped literary work will be greatly encouraged.

In the Fifth-day evening collection President Swain announced that the contract for the dormitories had been signed and that work would be started in a few days. It is expected that the basement will be completed, up to the first floor, by the middle of Twelfth month.

Sixth-day evening, Tenth month 16th, President Swain attended Moorestown Y. F. A. and gave his address, "A View of Nature and the Bible."

In meeting Doctor Holmes spoke on "Intellectual Courage," likening man to the mountain climber who had but the steep yielding cliffs in front of him, and all that was beautiful behind him. He said that we must still work up higher and higher, strong in the resolve to mount the rocks and stand on the summit.

The Young Friends' Association held its regular meeting Tenth month 18th, 1903. Dr. J. H. Holmes, Robert Fyle and Caroline Hadley were named on the program as persons chosen to take part in the exercises of the meeting. The officers elected for the following term are: President, Halliday Jackson; Vice-President, William Linton; Secretary, Esther Rogers. The topic discussed was "Toronto and the Conference." The meeting was very interesting and starts the year in an auspicious manner.

On Sixth-day Dean Bond gave a reception to the Freshman girls. A very enjoyable evening was spent. The upper classes were entertained at President Swain's on Tenth month 17th, 1903. The Seniors and Juniors buried the hatchet for the evening and enjoyed one of the most pleasant evenings of their college life.

ABINGTON.

The Abington Friends' School opened on Ninth month 15th, with a fair attendance. Since that date the roll has materially increased, so that the outlook for the school year is very satisfactory. A new heating system has been installed in the building; the need for this improvement has long been felt. In addition to this, several repairs and minor improvements were also completed during the summer recess.

The Faculty for 1903-4 is as follows: George M. Downing, M. S. (Pennsylvania State College), Principal; Science and Mathematics. Carrie B. Way, B. L. (Swarthmore College), English. Isadore E. Cropsey, B. Mus. (Syracuse University), German and Music. Harry H. Derr, (Graduate of West Chester Normal School), Mathematics and History. Lyndon E. Ayres, B. A. (Bucknell University), Latin and Mathematics. Emma Schmidt, French and German. May E. Stevenson (Graduate of School of Industrial Art), Manual Training. Rachel S. Martin (Graduate of West Chester Normal School), Principal of Primary Department. Elizabeth R. Cox (Graduate of Abington Friends' School), Assistant in Primary Department; Geography. Alda D. Leaw, Matron.

The Abington First-day School, which consists largely of the students of this school, was organized in the meeting-house on Tenth month 4th. Emma W. Gaskill is superintendent, and classes are in charge of the superintendent, George M. Downing and Anna T. Roberts.

The interior of the meeting-house presents a much improved appearance; the walls have been newly plastered and the ceilings panelled. Many curious hunters carried away relics in the form of old lath and nails which had been removed from the building in the course of repairs. The laths were hand-split and the nails hand-wrought over two hundred years ago.

GEORGE SCHOOL.

Tenth month 17th, the Whittier Literary Society held its first regular meeting. The following program was given: Song, by four girls; recitation, "The Painter of Seville," Anna Stubbs; declamation, Fred Chambers; reading, "Aunt Sylvia's First Lesson in Geography," Elsie Cadwalader; "The Whittier Greenleaf," Harry Sherwood; essay, "The Art of Dyeing," Helen Woodward; recitation, "Intensely Utter," Lucile Gathrop; round, by eight boys; play, "A Studious Girl," Ruth Price and Jean Beatty.

Seventh-day evening Tenth month 10th, Helen Borton, of Woodstown, N. J., read "The Lost Word" by Henry van Dyke, before the Young Friends' Association. The beautiful selection was most feelingly and simply given and for about an hour, the reader held every one—even the youngest—in almost breathless silence.

A LARGE meteor which fell at Mendon, Mich., destroyed a portion of the bridge over the St. Joe River. It buried itself in the earth and made a hole nearly 30 feet deep. It gave forth a screeching sound as it passed through the sky, and struck the earth with a report that was heard for a long distance.

AN agreement of the pastors of the larger churches of Lincoln, Nebraska, taking measures to discourage the establishment of several projected new churches on the ground that the field is already covered, is described by the newspapers as an "ironclad agreement intended to drive out the small church and return greater revenues to the larger."

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

WESTERN FIRST-DAY SCHOOL UNION.—The Western First-day School Union was held at Pennsgrove Meeting-house, Seventh-day, Tenth month 17th, 1903.

The day was a rainy one and while the number present was not so large as is sometimes noted, the interested workers were there. The presiding clerk read the 2d chapter of I. John as an opening exercise. After the reading and approval of the previous minutes and reports of the several standing committees of the Union, the reports from the schools were read and commented upon, some of which were very encouraging, while others were not so hopeful.

In the afternoon session, a little girl from West Grove School gave a beautiful recitation "The Pansies," and a member of Pennsgrove School in an able manner recited a touching temperance story, "Old Soapy."

The following questions, "What are the chief impediments in the way of making First-day Schools more successful?" "What are the ends in view in studying the Bible?" "What are the advantages of the 'One-Topic' Lesson Leaves?" were the subjects for discussion and brought out varied sentiments and valuable suggestions.

A beautiful feeling of nearness and love seemed to pervade the meeting and many present bore testimony at the close to the helpfulness and benefit of this Union and of the inspiration of the hour, giving evidence of the presence of the Heavenly Father. It was decided to hold the next Union at West Grove Meeting-house. E. P. W., Rec. Clerk.

CONCORD FIRST-DAY SCHOOL UNION.—This body held its autumn session at Goshen, Chester county, Pa., on the 17th inst. Although the day was rainy the house was well filled, many driving miles to attend, and the meeting was a lively and inspiring one, the delegates returning to their work with renewed enthusiasm for it. The report from Wilmington was thought too valuable to be kept within the limits of Concord Union. It is published in full in another column.

WEST PHILADELPHIA.—The Junior Young Friends held their first social for the winter at the home of George Miller, on Sixth-day evening the 16th of Tenth month. A very interesting program consisting of a recitation by Mary Dunham, a talk by Dr. Thatcher on his summer vacation, a recitation by William Webster, Jr., and a few words from Anna M. Biddle and others on their summer experiences.

The following were appointed on the program committee for our next meeting, Ralph Bicknell, Edna Webster, Lida Scott and William Webster, Jr. W. W., Jr.

MANSFIELD, N. J.—The Young Friends' Association met Tenth month 10th at the home of Annie and Thomas Bunting, with twenty-eight in attendance. The Vice-President called the meeting to order by reading the 17th chapter of St. John.

The evening exercises were opened by Mary S. Harvey, who read from the discipline on "War." Martha E. Gibbs' question "Was there any excuse for the persecution of the Friends by the Puritans?" was ably answered. She said the Friends generally thought there was no excuse for such persecution as was suffered by the early exponents of our faith. Bancroft, the historian, says their belief was identical with ours. Yet, it is given as some excuse that "the early advocates of the Quakers in New England displayed little of the mild philosophy, the statesman-like benevolence of Penn and his disciples, though they possessed the virtue of passive resistance in perfection." The martyrs, Mary Dyer, Wm. Robinson, Wm. Leddra and Marmaduke Stephen fell victims, rather to the contest of will than to the opinion that Quakerism was a capital crime. How many of us this day would be willing to undergo such persecution for our faith? The question, "What do you think is the most important reform movement at this time?" was answered by Annie Bunting, selecting as the movement "Temperance," and reading an article showing the evil done in South and North Dakota. Where towns are free from the sale they prosper. "Is the Spirit of the Life the same as the Inner Light?" was generally answered. "Christ said, My Words are the Spirit and the Life," was quoted by Thomas A. Bunting. Others said they saw no difference.

Mary R. Moore gave us selected current topics. A reading was rendered by Edith S. Gibbs entitled, "The Manliest Man." Cyrus S. Moore gave us a talk on the rapid development of the West from his recent observation.

The next meeting will be held at the home of Anna B. and Robert Taylor on Eleventh month 7th, 1903.

MABELLE E. HARVEY, Secretary.

QUAKERTOWN, PA.—The Young Friends' Association met at the home of Milton and Martha Johnson, Tenth month 15th, with a good attendance. The President opened the meeting with a Scripture reading, Galatians, fifth chapter. The usual time was devoted to business. Elmer Jordan and Emma Shaw were appointed to attend the General Conference of Friends' Associations at Wilmington, Del., Eleventh month 14th. The regular program was taken up. Emma Shaw continued the history reading of "Life of Benjamin Hallows." J. Miles Jordan continued reading from the book entitled "The Man of Plain Speech." We find both these readings very interesting. Two readings were given from the Friends' Journal, one by Phebe R. Bewley on "Wastefulness," another by Isaac W. Reeder "The Sending of the Apostles." Anna W. Ball recited "Dost Thou Know?"

Dost thou know? Yes, truly yes,

It is a little thing;

But of power untold to bless,

Through life's wandering—

For what sweeter music heard

On earth's sphere than a "Kind Word."

Sentiments were given, a short silence observed. The meeting adjourned to meet in Eleventh month at the home of Edward Shaw.

A. B. R., Cor. Sec.

HOPEWELL, VA.—The regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association, was held Tenth month 18th. After the reading of the First Psalm, M. S. Lupton had an interesting article on George Fox's Journal. Laura A. Robinson read a poem entitled, "The School of Sorrow." Lewis Pidgeon read an essay, which was published some time ago in the INTELLIGENCER, "The Quakers as Makers of America." We thought it contained much good, worthy of our study. A very interesting selection of Current Events, was read by Annie Rees. A communication was read from the Executive Committee, asking us to forward the names of five delegates to attend the General Conference of Friends' Associations, to be held at Wilmington, Del., Seventh-day, Eleventh month 14th, 1903. A committee was appointed to select the delegates. After a few minutes' silence, the meeting adjourned.

C. P., Cor. Sec.

ACCTONK, VA.—The Young Friends' Association met at home of Joseph W. Cox, Tenth month 4th. The president opened the meeting with a reading of the 37th Psalm. Sarah E. Cox read the biography of Mary Brooke. Chas. M. Pidgeon read an essay that had been loaned to the association, being a comparison of the Dunkards, Shakers and Quakers, which called forth some discussion. Mary Lukens read the second chapter from "The Penns and Penningtons." Lida Gillingham recited "A Voice in the Twilight," and Dorothy Walton "The Oak Baby."

After election of officers, roll call and a short silence the association adjourned to meet at the home of Warrington Gillingham, Eleventh month 1st, 1903.

ELLEN LUKENS, Secretary.

The French lecturer who will this year deliver the Hyde lectures, under the auspices of the "Cercle Francais de l'Universite Harvard," will be Anatole Leroy Beaulieu, author and member of the Institute of France. The general subject of this course of lectures will be "Christianisme et Democratie," and will embrace a survey of the political and religious history of France.

CURRENT EVENTS.

THE final arrangement of an arbitration treaty between England and France has revived interest in such a treaty between the United States and England. If a similar treaty to the one that failed by a few votes in 1897 were to come before the Senate now, there could be little question of its ratification. Louis Sinclair, M. P., Joint Honorable Secretary of the House of Commons' Commercial Committee said a few days ago that the committee's next work would be to endeavor to arrange an arbitration treaty with the United States. In France too there is a strong desire to act on a resolution passed some time ago by the Chamber of Deputies in favor of a Franco-American treaty.

THE object of the National Civic Federation Conference in session in Chicago last week was to do what it might toward establishing more rightful relations between employer and employees and to end strife. The "open shop" and the attitude of union workers toward those not members of the union was very freely discussed and took up much of the time of the conference. Among the speakers were John Mitchell of the Mine Workers, John M. Stahl of the Farmers' National Congress, Marcus M. Marks of the National Clothing Manufacturers' Association, of New York, W. H. Pfahler of Philadelphia, President Buchanan of the Iron Workers, Dr. Josiah Strong of New York, President Gompers of the Federation of Labor.

THE ninety-fourth annual meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions met at Manchester, N. H., last week. Reports showed the receipts for the year to have been $740,771, the disbursements $740,522.

The Eastern Missionary Convention of the Methodist Episcopal Church was holding an enthusiastic convention at the same time in Philadelphia.

This week the International Missionary Convention of the Christian Church has been in session at Detroit. At one of the sessions Ex-Governor Drake of Indiana announced that he would give $5,000 to start a Bible college in India, he having already given $5,000 each for Bible colleges in Japan and China. This denomination has a total of 117 missionaries and 290 native helpers. For the coming year it proposes to raise $250,000 for mission work.

THE purpose of the Congress of Arts and Sciences, to meet at the St. Louis Exposition, Ninth month 19th to 26th, 1904, is to demonstrate the inter-relation of all scientific work. A committee in its interests consisting of Dr. Simon Newcomb, Washington, D. C.; Professor Hugo Muensterberg, Harvard, and Professor A. W. Small, Chicago, has spent four months in Europe, and in that time presented 130 invitations to the most noted of the European savants, of which 114 have accepted. Germany, Great Britain, France, Austria, Italy, Switzerland, Russia and Holland will be represented at the Congress. Each scientist invited will contribute a definite piece of work, and the Exposition has appropriated $200,000 to cover the expense of the congress and the honorariums of the speakers.

REPORTS to the Board of Managers of Haverford College at their annual meeting at Fourth and Arch Streets, Philadelphia on the 13th show that $73,267 have been donated to the college during the year just ended, and that there has been an increase in the invested funds of $34,209. Invested funds now amount to $1,000,000, and the real estate is valued at $1,000,000. The students number 129, more than ever enrolled before. President Sharpless said in his annual report that there is no trace of professionalism in the athletic sports at the college. No member of the football team receives pay, and the coaches give their services gratis.

ROCKEFELLER HALL, the new dormitory of Bryn Mawr College, will be completed within a few weeks. It is built of gray stone, and the main wing is 347 feet long, containing the rooms for the students. The hall is to hold eighty-four students, and about two-thirds of these will be able to have a study and a small adjoining bed room each. The rest will have single rooms. John D. Rockefeller gave the building, costing $145,000, as part of his munificent gift to the college, the other part being the central lighting and heating plant.

In southeastern Europe the movement for Turkey to withdraw two soldiers for every Bulgarian withdrawn, and so for gradual decrease of both armies seems to be progressing. Bulgaria it is stated has ordered the disbandment of 10,000 troops now on the frontier, also one class of Bulgarian reservists to the number of 5,000. If Turkey follows suit others will be disbanded. Meantime many Macedonians are emigrating and it is reported that a lively agitation is on foot to induce more to come to the United States.

THE decision of the Alaska Boundary Commissioners was signed on the 18th by all except the two Canadian Commissioners. The decision grants all the American claims except in regard to Portland Channel which was decided in favor of Canada, giving her her only outlet to the sea in the northwest.

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD TRAIN PORTERS.

A popular feature of the through trains of the Pennsylvania Railroad which leave New York daily for the West at 7:55 a.m. and 1:55 p.m., and leave Pittsburg daily for the East at 3:00 a.m. and 7:30 a.m., are the train porters stationed in the day coaches.

Their duty consists of keeping the cars clean and rendering whatever service passengers may require. The Pullman porter has long since demonstrated his usefulness; the Pennsylvania Railroad train porter serves the ordinary coach passenger in the same capacity as the Pullman porter serves those who ride in parlor and sleeping cars.

The day coaches on the above-mentioned trains, as well as those on trains leaving New York at 5:55 p. m. daily for the West and leaving Pittsburg at 7:10 p. m. daily for the East, are equipped with lavatories, in connection with which the services of train porters are especially convenient.

GOOD WORDS FOR 1903.

XLIV.

It is the high privilege of every human soul to be the revelation to others of just so much of the Divine as can be appropriated and lived.

ELIZABETH POWELL BOND.

In "Words by the Way."

DEATH.

"O DEATH!
I would that thou wert dead." Then Death answered me. His voice was gentle, and through all his pallor There gleamed the outline of a smile. I saw Transfigured Death.
"I am God's servant. The flock must be brought home. I go to bring the wanderers to the fold. The lambs are God's, not yours; or yours but to Watch and tend until he sends for them. Through your own fatherhood read God's heart. Through your own watching for the child's return Conceive the thought that glows in love divine."
—Dr. Joseph Parker, in Christian Herald.

BALTIMORE YEARLY MEETING.

MINISTERS AND ELDERS.

In the meeting of ministers and elders a minute of unity was read for Elizabeth Lloyd, a minister of Buckingham Monthly Meeting, Pa. Visiting Friends who were present without minutes were William and Henrietta H. Bedell, of New York Yearly Meeting and Mary T. Freeman, of Genesee Yearly Meeting. The representatives were present excepting seven; for the absence of most of these sufficient reasons were given.

William W. Moore was released from further service as clerk at his own request and Alfred Wood and Catharine B. Thomas were appointed clerks for the ensuing year.

Attention was called to the responsibility resting upon ministers and elders for the increase of the membership, and the thought was thrown out that with meetings as with individuals, those that are seeking only to build up themselves will decrease, while those that are concerned to reach out and bless the lives around them will increase in numbers and influence.

As the answers to the queries were read the thought was expressed that attendance at meetings may be encouraged in two ways: by having the meetings full of spiritual life, and by the manifestation of personal interest toward those who absent themselves.

The love and unity reported in the answers was felt to be ground for encouragement, and the power that might be exerted by the seventy-five ministers and elders present if each one would be faithful was enlarged upon.

A young overseer was referred to who had paid a friendly visit to every family where there was a member of meeting; the result of this was an increased attendance and several applications for membership.

Those who had been removed by death from their accustomed places were held in loving memory. Thanks were returned to the Heavenly Father for his many mercies and the earnest prayer offered that all might receive a fresh baptism of the Holy Spirit.

FIRST-DAY.

The weather on First-day morning was all that could be desired and Park Avenue Meeting-house was full. The silence was broken by John J. Cornell, who explained Friends' basal principles and showed them to be sufficient for the salvation of the soul from sin.

Elizabeth Lloyd said that three things are essential for those who are followers of Jesus the Christ,—they must be children of God, they must bear witness to the truth and they must go about doing good.

Henry W. Wilbur invited all to read the word of God as it is written in books, in nature and in human life. He said that the humblest lives are often the most beautiful in God's sight, and that obedience to divine revelation is the only path to peace. He concluded with an earnest prayer that the weak might be strengthened and the sorrowing comforted.

In the afternoon the Young People's Meeting, in which there were representatives from the various First-day schools connected with the yearly meeting, was conducted by Eli M. Lamb. After a responsive Scripture reading an exercise was given by a class from the Baltimore school showing Bible authority for Friends' testimonies. This was followed by a recitation, "Faith and Reason," by Lydia Reynolds. Helpful talks to the boys and girls were given by Henry R. Sharpless and Reuben Kester, the latter making a strong plea for greater reverence. A suggestive address to teachers by Edwin R. Buffington closed the program.

In the evening the meeting for worship was almost as large as in the morning. Edwin R. Buffington, while holding fast to the eternal foundations, made a plea for new methods as they may be found necessary. Phineas J. Nichols appealed to "the lost sheep of the house of Israel," the prodigal sons in the Society of Friends, to repent the foolish squandering of their inheritance and return to the Father's house. Elizabeth Lloyd said that the Christian life is a life of growth and service and that spiritual birth must precede spiritual growth. O. Edward Janney appealed to all present who had not already given their hearts to God to enter into his service at once. Haviland Hull enlarged upon the beauty of the religious life. Sarah R. Matthews asked the question, "Am I My Brother's Keeper?" reminding all of the interest they ought to feel in the welfare of others.

SECOND-DAY.

A number of the representatives to the yearly meeting were absent; for ten of these sufficient excuses were given. The report from Centre Quarterly Meeting contained the following passage: "We have felt deeply at this time the bodily absence of our dear departed friend, William P. Fisher, who was taken from our midst so recently. We have missed his wise counsel in our business transactions, but above all we have felt the loss of his silent, deep, spiritual ministry in our meetings for worship."

In addition to the minute read on Seventh-day a minute was read for Chalkley Webster, a minister of Penn's Grove Meeting, Pa. Mordecai and Rebecca Bartram, of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, were mentioned as being present without minutes. These and all other visiting Friends were given a cordial welcome.

A proposition made last year for a change in the manner of appointing committees was considered, and it was decided that the representatives appoint a nominating committee, consisting of two members from each monthly meeting, and that all committees usually appointed by the yearly meeting be nominated by this committee. The purpose of this change is to guard against the appointment of the same persons to serve on a number of committees that may be in session at the same time.

Edward Stabler, Jr., was reappointed clerk, Elizabeth M. Koser, assistant clerk, and Rebecca J. Broomell, reading clerk. The report of the Joint Committee on Isolated Members was read, and several expressed their interest in the work done. John J. Cornell said he thought the committee had overstepped the limits of its appointment in doing work in some cities that were within the limits of other yearly meetings. Elizabeth Lloyd explained that in such cities as Pittsburg, Buffalo and Cleveland, where there were members of several yearly meetings, the work had been assigned to the section of the committee from the meeting to which the city properly belonged.

A communication was read from the Maryland Anti-Saloon League, and the nominating committee was instructed to name two Friends to serve on the executive committee of the League, and also fifteen Friends to serve on the Central Committee of the General Conference.

The report of the First-day School Committee showed that the interest in this work is maintained. Parents were urged to take their children to home and other meetings whenever possible. A good system of circulating libraries has added much to the interest of the schools. The sum of $350 was appropriated for the use of this committee.

Epistles were read from Philadelphia, New York, and Genesee Yearly Meetings. Chalkley Webster emphasized the thought in one of them that no matter how coarse the material of which the vessel is made it must be of the right shape in order to be of service.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

THE DIVINE IN NATURE.—No. 1.

THE above title is so broad that it includes the entire universe. I can only hope to touch here and there the few points of its outer margin, as they have especially interested me as a teacher of Natural History, during a long life largely devoted to that branch of scientific study.

Looking backward over my own record, I can see plainly that while perhaps, at the time, not wholly conscious of it, I have always approached the study of Nature from the standpoint of the Theist; and that my first object in imparting instruction to the young, has been to implant in the mind a deeper sense of the constant operation of a Supreme Intelligence, originating and controlling all things.

This was, no doubt inevitable, from the qualities of both my parents, and from a descent through a long line of ancestors holding the views of George Fox and William Penn. We are what our ancestors determine, and our work, whether for good or for evil, is, in large measure, dependent upon them. Did parents fully appreciate this great truth, they would certainly be more earnest in endeavoring to endow their children with natures of the highest order, that the stream of life flowing downward through the generations, might be of the purest and best among mankind. Thus, from age to age, the general level would naturally rise, and our individual lives become of national and humanitarian importance through the higher, and ever higher development of our race.

Early in my studies of Nature I became interested in the water crystal as a convenient form of acquaintance with general laws, and made careful and persistent microscopic studies of it from the window pane in winter, and from glass slides cooled to a low degree, which when brought into a warm room, condensed the moisture of the atmosphere in it, and freezing it, afforded a view of the process of crystallization. I studied the water crystal that I might better understand the Plant and the Animal. I made many curious and interesting observations a few of which are of sufficient importance to mention.

In the first place, it may be well to state that what may not inaptly be termed the building blocks of the water crystal are by no means all of a similar form. On the contrary they are highly varied, and may be seen simply as frozen globules, or as more fully crystallized lozenges, diamonds, rhombs, hexagons, triangles, spicules, bars, fans, stems, leaves, and plates difficult to name. Neither are these blocks built up, invariably, by the same methods.

Snow crystals, in free air, with room to expand symmetrically on all sides, are usually, but not always, in a horizontal plane, radiating in six directions, dividing the circle of 360° into parts of sixty degrees each. Around a central pole, which may or may not be shown, the building blocks are arranged in a less or more complicated manner, some of them being so exquisitely beautiful that they affect the mind like a rich strain of music; and they are doubtless deposited under rhythmic laws equivalent to those of poetry and song. It is in allusion to the harmony of rock crystals that Prof. Tyndall has written "The beams of the earth are laid in music." So different are the patterns of snow crystals, that, considering the countless atoms in a drop of water, and the thousand fold number of smaller particles in each atom, it is not probable that any man has ever seen two complicated snow crystals formed exactly alike. Variability is as much a law of nature as is harmony, but each crystal is, in itself, a completed poem. The harmonies of nature seen by the eye, heard by the ear, or felt by the soul, are all of the same Divine nature, and should be accepted with profound gratitude, let us find them where we will.

On a fine, clear, cold, winter's morning, frost crystals on the window pane offer an admirable study. At first view we may roughly group the differing forms as feathery, star-like and straight-lined. The feathery forms often look white, instead of transparent, on the outer edges. Under a compound microscope, this effect is seen to be produced by a crumpling and contortion of the blocks, as though a strong pressure upon them had been exerted after their crystallization. It adds greatly to the beauty of the forms, emphasizing their outline and giving massiveness to the plumes. At the point of starting, the force exerted is evidently much less feeble, the blocks showing no crumpling or disarrangement. Possibly there is an analogy here to the breaking into flower and fruit in the plant, and members in the animal. Whether this is true or not, these feathery frost forms are exceedingly beautiful and interesting. Frequently on a stem like that of a plant, may be disposed lozenges in the manner of leaves, and on another stem of the same feather, may be arranged hexagons in a similar manner.

In the vertical lines, the same difference of method is exhibited. These are usually found to be composed of six-rayed stars superimposed one above the other, to the unassisted eye appearing only as a roughened line. But an entirely different method of construction may also be found. A vertical line will occasionally be met with which may be resolved into three or four lines. In the latter case, the two inner lines will be simply frozen globules, but on each side will be rows of lozenges or spicules, each one attached to a corresponding globule, on one side overlapping in an upward direction, and on the other in a downward direction. When four of these lines are composed of globules and spicules, the resemblance to the back bone of a fish is so striking that no one can avoid seeing it. In reality, we have before us, a bilateral mode of building up the water crystal. There is also proof of the existence of a force whose office is to reverse, by turning the plates upward on one side and downward on the other. Naturalists may, as they often do, discuss the point where bilaterality first makes its appearance in the plant or the animal world, but the compound microscope proves that it exists in the water crystal, and how much lower I do not know. It may possibly be found in the atom itself, or in the parts which are a thousand times less than the atoms, but which have been weighed and the rate of their motion discovered. Let bilaterality appear where it will, it gives us two feet and two hands, two eyes and two ears, two sides to our complicated brains, and helps to balance us in the erect position natural to man. It would lead me too far to enter on the existence of a reversing force in nature, but its importance in the scheme of creation is vast, doubtless far beyond our finite conception.

While examining cooled glass slides, at the instant of insertion under the microscope, two bands, as though made by a camel's hair pencil, swept over the congealing vapor on the glass, moving in opposite directions. They met at an obtuse angle, and here appeared a perfect lozenge under my gaze. I never had the good fortune to see the evolution of the hexagon, but I did see the clearing of vapor from a space in which six globules of water concentrated. These were disposed, three above and three below, a common centre, and, although I could not measure them accurately, they looked as though they might be sixty degrees apart, in obedience to the law for six-rayed crystals. The moisture on the glass evaporated too quickly for the completion of the crystal, but the method of its formation was clearly seen.

At another time, a brilliant crystal, with its rays beveled, formed on the slide I was examining. It had but five horizontal rays, the sixth standing up, perpendicular to these, as a central pole. It did not melt rapidly, and was the most beautiful and perfect crystal which I met with during these microscopic researches. It may have been due to some element, possibly carbon, in the atmosphere of the room, rather than to the water deposited from its moisture.

Spiral movement is nearly always to be seen in the central globules of intricate six-rayed or six-branched water crystals. These central globules appear to have been spirally swirled before the crystallization of the exterior parts. In a drawing which I made, and which is dated December 29th-30th, 1880, penciled in a warm room with the outside thermometer several degrees below zero, spirals are conspicuous at the extremities of branching forms which covered the window pane. These flat spiral coils were large enough to be seen distinctly without the use of the microscope, being at least a half inch in diameter.

Spiral coils are frequent both in the plant and the animal world, as any one may recall who is familiar with the forms of either. In anatomy and palaeontology Professor Cope explains that the four-chambered heart of the mammal, with all its attendant advantages, is due originally, to a spiral movement which brought rudimentary partitions in the three-chambered heart of a lower grade of animals, into close connection with each other, thus closing the aperture which had before existed, and bringing into being a new and higher class of animal life, when the time was ripe for it. Astronomers assure us that the majority of nebula are spiral in form. The pathway of our own sun is supposed to be a vast spiral rising from the unknown, towards the unknown, amid its kindred suns.

Summing up the lessons of the water crystal, we find: 1. Mathematical accuracy. 2. Variability and free play. 3. Rhythmic action and harmony. 4. Centripetal action, or holding to a center. 5. Centrifugal action, or driving from a center. 6. Bilaterality, or two-sidedness. 7. A reversing force, causing changes on opposite sides. 8. Spiral movements. 9. The combination of all, or any number of these activities.

It is to be remembered that man has nothing whatever to do with the origin of these forces. They are entirely independent of him. They must have been in existence during all time. They must continue during all time, and they must apply to all worlds where oxygen and hydrogen combine to form water, and where the temperature descends below the freezing point. By the water crystal, and by the crystallizing forces, we are connected with all plant and animal life; and with worlds, it may be, innumerable, beyond our ken. How grand is the view which links the least with the greatest in one great system of Divine workmanship.

GRACEANNA LEWIS.

THE HIGHEST CRITICISM.

THE so-called higher critics have for some time past abandoned the term "Word of God" as a name for the Scriptures, but on a ground the reverse of that which for over two centuries has been taken by our religious Society. Our confidence in the declarations of the Bible itself enables us to unite with the Bible's express declaration that Another than itself, even Christ, is the Word of God,—agreeably with the opening of John's Gospel and several other passages; but the shaken confidence of the critics disables them from continuing to name the Bible by that term. Yet we know of some of them who still so revere Christ as God's declaration of Himself to man, and the opener of his counsels to the heart, as with us to call Him the Word of God. So they from a disturbed, and we from an undisturbed confidence in Scripture sayings, place the designation "Word of God" not on any book. We place it on Christ, where the Book itself places it.

"For the Word of God is living and active (literally in-working), and sharper than any two-edged sword, and piercing even to the dividing of soul and spirit, of both joints and marrow, and quick-to-discern (literally, a critic or discriminator of) the thoughts and intents of the heart." Here is the higher criticism that we so much want,—even the highest; a criticism by the Word and not of the Word, or of his words. To be qualified for "rightly dividing the word of truth," or any of the language of the word of truth, one's soul and spirit, thoughts, and intents of heart, must come under that highest criticism by the Word of God which is living and inworking.

Let the higher critics find out what they may, it will not jostle the faithful witnesses of the highest criticism, who know Him to whom all judgment is committed, and whom they have believed. He the Author and Finisher of our faith, speaking to our condition, is able to serve the purpose of all the written Scriptures to us as the Word of life, without whose Spirit the letter is dead, and the Scriptures not witnessed as holy.

But let the Scriptures be devoutly cherished, for they testify of Him; yet to what avail, if we will not come to Him that we might have Life? He that has the Scriptures may not have life, but "he that hath the Son hath life," and in that life will best find them precious, opened to his understanding, and sanctified by the Word of Life.—[The Friend, Philadelphia.]

PAUL'S LETTER TO A VILLAGE.

OUT of a thousand who read Paul's Epistle to the Colossians, who knows anything about the town of Colossæ, or remembers that it was only a decaying and dying townlet, little more than a village, that had once been a city, but was now left to itself. This fact is significant, and throws valuable light on the character of Paul and on his methods of work. There are many workers who are interested in the great centres of the population, and who pass by the smaller places. There are many whose work, whether in the city or in the country, is circumscribed to an extent that makes them feel that it hardly counts at all. But Paul was ready to do the needed thing, and the fact that Colossæ was a small and, from a commercial and political standpoint, an insignificant place, did not make him feel that it was not worth while to write to the people there, who were in danger of being led away by false teaching, a letter to strengthen, and warn them. In writing this letter there was no slipshod work, as though it mattered not. But we have here an Epistle that ranks high in the beauty and in the spirituality of its teaching. There are many lessons to be learned from reading it, but the fact of the Epistle and the place where its first readers lived, is a great lesson in itself, and teaches us not to despise the day of small things, or to consider because our work is necessarily a restricted one, that therefore it is of little use. The Colossians proved worthy guardians of the letter, and through them Paul has preached to thousands upon thousands.—[Interchange, Baltimore.]

NEW TESTAMENT LESSON.—No. 39.

HEBREWS.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Therefore let us also, seeing we are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, lay aside every weight and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us.—Hebrews, xii., 1.

Before study of Lesson read Hebrews, ii., 1-9;
v., 1-10; xi., 1-12.

THE condition of the Palestinian Christians as a sect of the Jews continued unchanged for a number of years. With the gradual disappearance of the apostles and others who had actually witnessed the events of the life of Jesus there came upon them, however, a critical period. These leaders had lived long in the expectation that most of them would not "taste of death." It was believed that Jesus himself had promised that the Son of man should come in his kingdom during the life of "some that stand here" (Matt., xvi., 28). As one after another "fell asleep" the faith of many was undermined. And this danger to the faith was more serious among the Jewish Christians than among the Gentiles; for the former depended far more on the expected outward kingdom, meeting as it would the Messianic hopes which were the heritage of their whole people. Their presence among the scenes associated with the life of Jesus and with the expected kingdom would tend also to make their hopes more vivid and their discouragement more intense.

The crisis seems to have been reached about the year 62, the year of the martyrdom of James, and near the time of the execution of Paul, if the doubtful tradition of his release after the first trial is ignored. The loss of these two who were regarded respectively as the heads of Gentile and Jewish Christianity was a great strain on the churches of Syria. An added pressure toward the church of their fathers lay in the increasing hostility to Rome among the Jews, showing itself in frequent revolts, and culminating in the beginning of the four years of war from 66 to 70. Patriotism was thus thrown in the balance against their weakened faith. Undoubtedly many returned to the Jewish faith, or perhaps we should rather say, left the Christian sect for the more zealous Jewish party. In Jerusalem the Jewish leaders had early felt the danger of the Christian propaganda. The execution of Stephen had been accomplished by them, that of James, the son of Zebedee, a little later, and the arrest of Peter by Agrippa, had been popular (Acts, xii., 1, 2). But, after this active persecution in the early forties had died away, there seems to have been a period of comparative peace for nearly a score of years. The martyrdom of James, the brother of Jesus, marks the beginning of renewed hostility. No doubt the Christians were felt to be false to their people in their tendency to suffer oppression without resistance when the nation was more and more approaching active rebellion. Moreover, the persecution of the Christians at Rome and elsewhere by order of Nero, and the accusations against them, though unfounded, pointed them out as safe subjects for attack. Some time in this period of storm and stress the church of Jerusalem removed to Pella, beyond Jordan, where its members were comparatively safe during the terrible wars of 66 to 70.

The letter to the Hebrews was written in this time of hesitation and doubt, with intent to encourage and strengthen those about to despair of their faith. The author is not known. The superscription attributing it to Paul is without any reasonable authority; it may be said with certainty that he was not the writer. Probably the author was not of important standing in the church, since he does not give his message the support of his name. The names of Silas, Barnabas, Apollos and Priscilla have been suggested; perhaps the case of Apollos is slightly the strongest, but there can be no certainty. It is believed that the letter was directed rather to one of the outlying churches, as that at Cæsarea, than to that at Jerusalem.

The writer urges upon his fellow-Christians "the greatness of the salvation already available, and not only guaranteed at a future season." Their Master was greater than the angels, greater than Moses, and therefore the more able to sustain them in temptation. He is also a High Priest, greater than those of the family of Aaron—a priest especially "named of God . . . after the order of Melchizedek" (Heb. v., 10—see Gen., xiv., 18), and so able to more effectively offer sacrifice. And what sacrifice had he offered? No other than himself. Having had this greatest of Masters and greatest of High Priests, would they now fall back on lesser masters and priests? Let them consider their own earlier experiences! Had the sacrifices, the tithes, the ablutions, sufficed to save them from sin? Had not the Christ been more effective? Why should they expect greater things of their ancient faith than they had already experienced? And what would be their standing before God, if, after knowing his will, they voluntarily turned their backs upon it. They would be even in worse plight than if they had never known the higher truth. Let them have faith, as their forefathers, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, had faith, and, like them, they would obtain the promised kingdom. Did they suffer and die? Were they persecuted? Others had been persecuted even unto death, and, having remained faithful, had been recompensed. But has not God turned from them since they are made to suffer? What son is there whom his father chasteneth not? If ye were not chastened ye would not be the children of God. Punishment never seems pleasant when we are enduring it, but afterwards we know the value of it. Wherefore be patient under God's chastening. Finally be loving, be pure, be content, be firm in the faith, and grace be with you.

It will be seen that the writer of the epistle assumes throughout that mere existence and comfort do not constitute success. Suffering and death are not signs of God's displeasure any more than luxury and long life are signs of his favor. Righteousness is success. The salvation we need is salvation from sin. We need God, not escape from God's punishments. The appeal is put in a form especially adapted to the Jewish mind, but it is again the appeal of Paul, of James,—of Jesus—the appeal for character and for that attitude toward life which makes for character.

TOPICS: The Place in Life of Suffering and Death. The Persecutions of Nero. The Jewish Christians. What is Christian Character?

GOODNESS is the purpose of religion, and its best proof. Conduct is the end of faith and its strongest support. God has revealed Himself in Christ in order that we may love Him and live with Him and be like Him. If we will do this we shall be sure of Him and help other men to be sure of Him, too. The best evidences of religion are holy and kind and useful and godly lives, really moulded and controlled by the divine Christ. The world waits and we must pray and labor, not for a more complete and logical theology, but for a more real and true and living Christianity. —[Henry van Dyke.]

GROWING TOWARD THE LIGHT.

THE development of a human soul has often been compared to the growth of a plant, and there are indeed many points of resemblance. Perhaps where an acorn has fallen to the ground a stone has been rolled over it; the germ within the acorn, in its desire to reach the light, finds its way around the stone and the plant then turns upward, but the stone has retarded its growth. Another tree has started to grow upright but winds blowing constantly in one direction, or some other outside pressure, have caused the trunk to lean; then the branches turn and take an unnatural position toward the trunk in order that they may follow their upward instinct. There are instances of trees whose trunks lie prone along the ground for several feet and then turn upward bearing their branches toward the sky. Still other trees have been broken off or cut down and new trees have grown up from their stumps.

Each one of these conditions is typical of many human lives. There are children born of vicious or ignorant parents within whom there is the God-given impulse toward good. They are groping in the darkness, trying to find the way around the stone beneath which they are buried; if they succeed by their own efforts, or if some kind hand rolls away the stone, there comes a turning point in their lives and they begin growing Godward.

Other children enter life under more favorable circumstances but as they grow older they are surrounded by temptations to which they yield again and again. If they continue to struggle against these temptations, perhaps being helped in their struggle by friends who love them, although their lives for a time may be warped and twisted, they will finally cease their wrong doings and live as God would have them live.

There are men who have turned away from the light for years, choosing to dwell in darkness. To these there may come some sudden revelation, some divine inshining, showing them clearly what they have missed, and then, like the tree whose trunk lies prone, there will be an intense reaching upward and a beginning of normal growth.

There are human beings so debased and degraded that they seem to be simply animals, desiring nothing but to gratify their appetites. Even in these pitiful human wrecks the dormant soul may be aroused and, like the new shoots growing from the old stump, they will reach out toward the light of God's love.

As the great majority of trees grow naturally heavenward so the majority of human lives obey the impulse that bids them be brave and true and pure and kind. There are few trees that are entirely symmetrical and there are few lives that are not more or less misshapen, but the desire to be good is a common possession. A child born of parents who love God, growing up in an atmosphere of virtue, will develop spiritually as he develops physically, and will have no need to be converted or born again. But those who have been kept in the dark, or whose growth has been hindered by the crowding of other lives, need to have a new environment. As soon as the light of love shines clearly upon them they will turn toward it; this impulse toward better things is conversion, and if circumstances continue favorable the new spiritual birth will lead to a higher spiritual life, until the awakened soul knows what it is to hold communion with God.

SOME SUGGESTIONS.

ONE of the editorials of the American Friend for Tenth month 15th is on "Round Tables" for the study of the history and testimonies of Friends in the early days. It is suggested that neighborhood groups be formed, and that, during some of the long winter evenings, they organize with not too much formality or machinery, for a study of the "rich story of our past."

"The course of study will depend very largely," the editor continues, "upon the capabilities of the group and the amount of historical reading which the members have previously done. One of the first things to get acquainted with, for any one who wishes to understand early Quakerism, would be the religious movements which were under way in the English commonwealth when George Fox began his work. Then there is the story of George Fox's own life and work; the type of men who helped him; the reasons for Quaker persecution; the substance of the Quaker message; the planting of Quakerism in America; the political influence of early Quakers; their social work; the character of their ministry; their belief in guidance, and a hundred other subjects equally important.

"Two persons should be asked to make special preparation for the subject of each evening, and to open its consideration with short papers. Meantime all the members of the group should be learning as much as possible upon the subject, so that there can be a fairly general discussion after the papers are finished. The subjects should as far as possible be assigned ahead for the whole winter, so that those who are to have papers can make all their reading count. The question of books will seem a difficulty in communities where there is no library, but a few dollars will secure the indispensable books, and probably there is no way in which the same dollars would yield a better return."

This is the kind of work many of our Young Friends' Associations are engaged in and they can get some good ideas for their winter's programs from these suggestions.

DEATHS.

BAKER.—On Sixth-day, Tenth month 23d, at his residence near Octoraro, Pa., Thomas Baker, in his 82d year. He was a consistent member of Sadsbury Monthly Meeting of Friends, and as long as physical strength would permit was regular in attendance at the religious and business meetings.

Thomas Baker was widely-known and highly-esteemed in Chester and Lancaster counties. His boyhood home was near Chatham, where his father, Lewis Baker, died when he, the oldest of three brothers, was but thirteen years of age. Though engaged on his mother's farm, he sought every opportunity for study and self-improvement, frequently taking his Euclid or Caesar to the field with him, and spending a few months each winter at one of the academies, at that time the chief educational institutions available.

At the age of seventeen he began his long, successful career as teacher in public and private schools and academies. For this high calling he possessed a remarkable fitness. A mild, even disposition coupled with firmness and impartial justice; a strong intellect and wonderful memory, clearness in presenting new thoughts to the student mind, combined with nobility of character and example, were a few of the qualities which made him a successful educator for upwards of thirty-five years. Very many are the people now in middle life who remember with pleasure and gratitude their school days under his counsel and instruction. Among those who were thus privileged were Isaac H. Clothier, of Philadelphia, and Congressman Marriott Brosius, late of Lancaster county.

But Thomas Baker was more than a school teacher. His ability and amicable disposition rendered him a useful citizen of the community of which he was an active member for nearly half a century. Not the least of his service was rendered as surveyor and conveyancer of real estate—his books contain "field notes" of many hundred farms in Lancaster and Chester counties. His careful work and good judgment made him particularly helpful in adjusting difficulties arising from disputed property lines.

Thomas Baker was married in 1855 to Eliza, daughter of James and Abigail Jackson, of Bart. She died in 1893. Of their children, four sons survive: Alison, of Smyrna, Pa.; J. Eugene, Principal of Boys' Department of Friends' Central School, Philadelphia; T. Xanthus and Lewis, residing in Lancaster county.

CARLILE.—At Montclair, New Jersey, on Fourth-day, Ninth month 16th, 1903, Emily S., widow of Amos Carlile, in the 82d year of her age; a member of Race Street Monthly Meeting. Interment at West Laurel Hill Cemetery.

LAWRENCE.—At her home in Attica, New York, Tenth month 12th, 1903, of cerebral apoplexy, Rebecca Ann, wife of William C. Lawrence, aged 76. She was the oldest grandchild of Samuel Comfort.

TOWNSEND.—At her home, 1730 Bolton street, Baltimore, Md., Tenth month 27th, 1903, Mary H. Townsend, wife of Joseph C. Townsend, and daughter of the late James L. and Elizabeth M. Sutton.

NOTES.

The Meeting for Sufferings or "representative committee" of London Yearly Meeting at its meeting on Tenth month 2d took into consideration the minute of the late yearly meeting on the opium evil. In the discussion two practical suggestions were made; that the meeting commend the matter to the several quarterly meetings, urging them to take up the responsibility devolving upon Friends; it might also take steps to convene a conference of representatives of the other Christian churches, which are "looking to us for a lead in regard to it." It was generally agreed that until Friends themselves are more fully informed on the question they could hardly invite others to come to confer with them upon it. The first duty seemed to be to "re-awaken the sense of responsibility in our own members." A minute for the quarterly meetings was finally adopted and a committee appointed to see to its circulation, and to arrange, where possible, for small deputations of well-informed Friends to visit the quarterly meetings and speak to the question.

At the same meeting the need of relief for the refugees in Bulgaria and Macedonia, and the responsibility of this country in reference to the terrible anarchy there, came up. Many spoke on this subject. One Friend thought that "we should let the Government understand that we are dissatisfied with the line they are taking." Another said, "While we maintain war to be wrong under any circumstances, we must recognize that English action in the past is largely responsible for the present sad state of affairs." A minute was adopted, to be sent to members of the Government, and to the press, as follows: "We feel deeply the responsibility of our country in the present circumstances, and we record our sense of honor and indignation at the massacres and cruelty now being carried on in Macedonia. While maintaining our principles on the wrongfulness of all war, we believe that there must be ways in which our Government might bring such moral force to bear in their relations with other European Powers, that something would be done to prevent further massacres, and to place the Government of Macedonia on a basis that would effectually prevent their recurrence. We, therefore, urge upon our Government the importance of taking some steps, even if they should involve self-sacrifice to this country, to bring about a happier state of things for the people concerned."

It was reported at this meeting that the application of a certain firm to register "Quaker" as the trade-mark for certain brands of intoxicating liquors, against which Friends had protested, had apparently been dropped.

The annual meeting of the Library Association of Friends will be held in the Lecture Room of Friends' Central School, Fifteenth and Race streets, Philadelphia, Eleventh month 13th, at 8 p. m. A brief business session will be followed by a paper, to be presented by Dean Elizabeth Powell Bond, of Swarthmore College, on "English Friends, and the Woodbrooke Summer Settlement." A cordial invitation is extended to all interested.

The following letter handed us by Joseph B. Haines, clerk of the Monthly Meeting, explains itself:

PHILADELPHIA, Tenth month 21st, 1903.

To the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia:

DEAR FRIENDS:—My heart is so filled with gratitude to my Heavenly Father, that I am impelled thus to speak to you, to acknowledge your appreciation of the love that fills your hearts; the varied evidences of which have been manifested the last few days. I am comfortably here, awaiting developments. No surgical operation has been performed; while, perhaps, no progress has been made toward permanent recovery, nothing new appears to discourage.

With love to you, thanking you again and again,

I am your friend,

ISAAC H. HILLBORN.

Since the above date Isaac Hillborn has been removed to his home, and no operation has been performed.

Word comes that our friend Joshua L. Mills is very ill. He was taken the early part of this month with a complication of diseases, and has had to endure intense suffering. The latest word we have had, received on the 23d, was that he had rested pretty well the night before the message was sent.

WESTBURY QUARTERLY MEETING.

WESTBURY QUARTERLY MEETING was held at Flushing, L. I., Tenth month 23d, 1903.

Samuel Haines and James Stringham spoke acceptably in the religious meeting, and Friends were reminded of the spirit in man to which the inspiration of the Almighty giveth understanding.

Loving mention was made of our Friend Robert R. Carpenter whose useful life was thought to be drawing to its close, and of his practical and earnest character.

In the business meeting the query relative to harmful amusements elicited special comment. It was admitted that our busy lives seem to need relaxation at times, but Friends seeking the uplift which might perhaps be received from music and the drama when presented in concerts, operas and plays of the best character, were admonished to discriminate between such and those that were trifling and vapid. Also in the reading of fiction we should distinguish between stories that are ephemeral and frivolous and those that are classics, that are noble and helpful in their character. If relief from the cares of busy life consists of things that make our moral natures stronger, then the diversion is not harmful, but if it is weakening, or even negative, like much card playing, when it is at least time wasted, then it is a harmful diversion.

Edward B. Rawson called attention to our severely plain meeting houses and said that the quality of our meetings is no doubt affected by their simplicity. It might be considered that if our homes, also, were as simple and required less attention, less worry and care to maintain than they do, perhaps we then would not find it so necessary to seek relief and relaxation in amusements that appear at least to raise question.

Wm. W. Cocks recommended Friends to notice that all the concerns of the queries are important; that we should not let our special interests, like temperance for example, cause us to forget the others, it being as important that we pay our just debts with promptitude as that we refrain from intoxicating drinks.

A suggestion was made that as the queries at present seem to be limited to matters pertaining to the personal lives of our members and to the conduct of their affairs, it might be useful to extend them by adding a query relative to what the society is doing to give better comprehension of our principles among our own members and to extend their influence in the world outside.

In the afternoon a meeting was held on the subject of First-day Schools. Margaret F. Vail opened the discussion by a short paper on the subject of "The Adult Class." In the paper she referred to the need of an adult class not only for the adults themselves, but to give support and countenance to the adolescents, the young people ranging in age from fifteen to twenty years, who "feel unpleasantly conspicuous when all the other members of the school are smaller boys and girls or little children." Relative to the Adult Class she offered the following questions for consideration:

Would it be better for our class to follow the lesson leaf topics and still keep in touch with the other classes, or would it be better to select an entirely independent line of study and let our relations with the rest of the school be kept up in some other line of general exercises?

What would be the best way to take up a study of the Bible?

Has there been any special line of Bible study marked out for Friends' schools?

The matters suggested by the paper were very generally discussed, notably by the younger members. The increase in our knowledge of Friendly thought that may be had by a well-conducted adult class was referred to, and Friends were urged to do all in their power to have not merely one but several such classes in every meeting. The object of such classes should be to make convictions confirmed, to make the members better Friends, better Christians, to make them more efficient instruments in the work of the Society. William M. Jackson said that the proper way to do this is to make people think for themselves. We should not be afraid to discuss any question that may be pertinent, and should discuss all. Is there a God? Does God reveal himself, and how? We need not be afraid of unsettling faith. All progress that has been made has been by unsettling faith in things that were not so. There would not be any unsettling of belief in God, but belief in false conceptions of his character. A class where the teacher is not afraid is one that grows.

Among the pleasant features incidental to the meetings were the dining together in the large dining-room of the meeting-house, and the ride to and from Flushing in the special trolley cars that had been engaged for that purpose. H. M. H.

THE FRIENDS' CENTENNIAL AT WAYNESVILLE, OHIO.

IN accordance with the program published in a recent number of the INTELLIGENCER, "The Friends' Centennial Commemorative Services," was held at Waynesville, Ohio, on the 16th and 17th of the present month. The weather was all that could be desired, as a shower the previous day had settled the dust and cleared the atmosphere.

Charles A. Brown, on behalf of our branch of Friends, gave a cordial welcome to all assembled to help commemorate this one hundredth anniversary of the founding of Miami Monthly Meeting, and expressed the hope that we meet with the utmost candor and feeling of Christian unity; that we meet, not only in a feeling of tolerance, but in catholicity of spirit, recognizing the universal Truth. The century passed has been a century of democracy founded upon the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, the early Friends recognized that truth above all others.

The first paper was Clarkson Butterworth's most comprehensive "History of Miami Monthly Meeting from its founding to 1828." Beginning with the Scripture foundation for the faith of Friends—that God writes his law in the human heart, he showed how the seed of inspiration, that had existed from the beginning, took root in the heart of George Fox, who by his earnestness and zeal spread it to others who eventually brought it to American shores resulting in the Friends' meetings of to-day; of which this special meeting whose anniversary we are celebrating, was one. The first assembling of Friends in this place was a volunteer meeting held Fourth month 26th, 1801, at the home of Rowland Richards and wife, when twelve families were represented, 68 persons being present.

Eli Jay, of Richmond, Indiana, followed with a concise "History of the Orthodox Branch from 1828 to present time." In 1827 their membership was 13,925, grouped in eight quarterly meetings with nearly forty monthly meetings and twice as many meetings for worship. He gave the date of the establishment of the various quarterly and yearly meetings since that time, and told of the extensive home and foreign missions, and Bible schools, and the educational work in their six colleges with 1,000 pupils, having spread largely from Miami Monthly Meeting. They now have seventy-one quarterly meetings in seven yearly meetings, with 67,532 members. He impressed the thought that mere numbers are of no value; it is the Christian spirit that actuates the individual that is of value.

At the opening of the afternoon session, Seth H. Ellis, chairman for the Orthodox Friends, spoke a few earnest words of welcome. The gray-haired people who had once had a home here, but from various reasons, had gone elsewhere; the younger ones who felt a warm interest here because loved parents had told them of their own attachment in days gone by when they had worshiped here; and those who, from press of business-life or other cares, had grown careless of the meeting, these he especially welcomed.

In treating the history of the meeting—our branch—since 1828, Davis Furnas, of Waynesville, Ohio, gave the names of all the Friends who had held official positions in it from 1828 to the present time. There were two recorded ministers in 1828, and had been ten others since. He followed with an account of the meeting for 65 years, as he could recall it, telling of the zeal of the early Friends who so faithfully attended. For 100 years the members of this meeting have met without one omission, twice a week. He explained how the dress and language must be strictly adhered to in that early day, for the reason that these—to say the least—were safe-guards; that no one adhering strictly to these customs, would be led to violate the high ideals of integrity and uprightness held by the Society. The meeting-house was built in 1811 and was slightly remodeled in 1865. He gave an account of the work done for the colored people and Indians, and along the lines of temperance, peace and arbitration. He recognized the fact that there are short-comings among us, and closed by giving a pen-picture of early Friends, by which the younger members were given an idea of the customs of their ancestors.

In summing up "What Quakerism has done for the recognition of woman," Mary Battin Boone, of Richmond, Indiana, cited three things in particular, chivalry, the revival of learning, and the introduction of Christianity; but it remained for the Friends, as a religious body, to raise women to an equality with men.

In her paper on "Quakerism and Slavery," May Pemberton, of West Milton, Ohio, gave a comprehensive review of the attitude of Friends towards slavery. To be a Quaker in the early days was to be a reformer. From the early dawn of Quakerism they have worked against the evils of slavery. She referred to the laws made to exclude slaves from attending the meetings, and how Friends continued to meet at private houses taking their slaves with them. It was Friends, she said, who organized the first anti-slavery societies in America, and she gave interesting portrayals of the treatment they received.

The paper by Dr. Robert E. Pretlow, of Wilmington, Ohio, on "Quakerism and the Ordinances," contrasted the ritualist and the Quaker. He said the early Quakers had no more reverence for the rituals than had their Master, the man of Galilee. They only asked, "Is it right?" It is not the specific act of the washing of the feet or of baptism, but the spirit manifested. . . . Christ never used the word baptism where it meant water. Christian baptism is not material, but spiritual. There is no spiritual life save as the spirit has fellowship with God. The Quaker sees in love the life-giving blood, and in spirit the body. Quakerism knows no other religion than a freedom to worship in the power of God. He pointed out that George Fox called away from the ordinances because they were empty forms.

"Quakerism and Temperance," was treated by Esther Pugh, of Selma, Ohio, under the heading, "The Influence of Friends on the Temperance Reform." She reviewed the position taken by the early Friends in regard to feeling that they could not conscientiously mingle with other workers or use their methods; yet they felt their way out in the great matters pertaining to their spiritual life, and had now come to see their way clear to join in the work of the W. C. T. U. and other organizations. Nineteen Friends have been State Presidents of the W. C. T. U., and a Friend has for eight years been President of the National Temperance Society.

Interesting biographical sketches followed of Joel Wright, read by Jesse Wright, of Springboro, Ohio, and Robert Furnas, read by Mary F. Frame, of Waynesville, which closed the afternoon exercises.

At 7:30 p. m. Professor J. B. Wright, of Harveysburg, Ohio, read his paper on "Trend of Modern Religious Thought toward Quakerism." He said the most spiritual-minded people see no saving virtue in the outward ordinances. A change has come in the attitude towards war, there is now a consensus of opinion that war is wrong. History has changed, it no longer writes up the awful horrors of war, and the novelist no longer dwells on the details of crime. The theologian has changed as well as the novelist; he teaches love and not war, that to live for others is the highest help. The Quakers have ever been practicing this doctrine of love, and the belated world is coming to understand the principles for which Quakerism stands; its principles are coming to be the possession of the rank and file.

Esther S. Wallace, of Richmond, Indiana, read an original poem in harmony with the occasion, after which Wilson Doane, of Indianapolis, Indiana, read his paper on "Has Quakerism a vital message to the world to-day?"

He alluded to the messages of the past, how the Jews and the Greeks each had their message; how Daniel Webster had a message of statesmanship etc.; and said a man, a nation, a religion, without a message, is dead, and asked the very pertinent question "Is the Society of Friends without a message?"

The flower of the Reformation brought forth Penn and Fox and Barclay, and the Quaker came with a message of faith in the heart needing no priest to interpret it. His was a message of freedom, of knowledge, of piety.

The founding of Miami Monthly Meeting was a message to Ohio and other states. The Society of Friends' message is, not to save souls alone but to keep souls from being lost.

The message of Quakerism is for a higher civilization, not only in Manilla and South Africa, but in Washington City and in Parliament. Let the Society of Friends teach the confirmation of the Divine rule, whatsoever thou wouldst have others to do, do thou even so.

The air was clear, cool and bracing on Seventh-day morning. The early part of the first session was occupied by the reading of carefully prepared biographical sketches of pioneer members who with those of whom we had heard the previous day had helped so largely in making the history of all our western meetings. Samuel Linton, was read by Mary Bailey, of Waynesville, Ohio; Abijah O'Neal, read by Ella Keys, of Waynesville, Ohio; Samuel Kelly, read by Mabel Wilson, of Selma, Ohio.

We then listened to Professor Elbert J. Russell, of Earlham College, Richmond, Indiana, on "Peace and Arbitration." The influence we call Quakerism is an inherited principle; its net results are far more numerous than any record outside of God's judgment Book, would show. He said the Friend's refusal to fight was only a negative attitude as he refuses from neither cowardice nor treason, but from conscience, and people now show respect to conscience. George Fox lived in that power that removed all cause of war, but he opposed war as he did all other evil. In the truly converted man the impulse to war, and the spirit of it, must cease. It is not a good peace policy to leave the subject of war to war men, and he emphasized the thought that there is a more effective way to overcome evil than by war.

Neither Dr. Boone nor Dr. Venable, of Cincinnati, O., were present, but the "Influence of Quakerism on Education" was interestingly discussed, in brief "Talks" by Pres. Kelley, of Earlham College; Prof. Haines, of Ohio State University; and Dr. Walton, of the George School.

President Kelley paid high tribute to the Monthly Meeting Schools as the forerunner or first impulse toward education. Friends have always inculcated the idea that religion must go hand in hand with education. Prof. Haines said sympathy coupled with good, hard, common sense, is the keynote of education today. Dr. Walton impressed the thought that no knowledge is of any worth save what can be assimilated. There are three things Friends should know: To distinguish between right and wrong; to distinguish between truth and falsehood; and between the beautiful and ugly, and in each case, do it for himself. We should incorporate into the schools of America the doctrine of early Friends, of self-government.

At the opening of the afternoon session, Dr. Walton, in his paper "Fundamental Doctrine of Quakerism," spoke of the unsatisfied yearnings of the human mind; how that part that is finite finds in itself a lack of that which will satisfy; fails to find fulfillment in what men call culture; and the yearning can only be satisfied by the spiritual.

In this age of democracy we scarcely understand what religious liberty is; that it does not mean license. He forcibly illustrated this point by the locomotive engine and the ocean greyhound which are free only when a power other than their own guides them. The mother, with love in her heart for the wayward child, is free only when she has the chance to minister unto him.

A kind of freedom not very well understood in that early day, and not yet fully understood—that Truth was greater than the witness for Truth; that the gospel is greater than the written Gospel; that Christ is greater than the Bible.

President Albert J. Brown, of Wilmington College, O., spoke without notes. The quality of the message of Quakerism had its origin in the conception that George Fox had of God. It seems that he had a conception that must be fundamentally true because he was able to demonstrate it in practical fulfillment. The doctrine of love means—as John set it forth—that something appeals to the judgment of men, as well as to their emotions. George Fox had the traditions of centuries to appeal to, but he heeded them not, but appealed to God. He was a prophet of God who had apprehended God. There is no class in Quakerism—no priestcraft, every man stands upon his own individuality. He alluded to slavery, intemperance and the industrial problems, and said with love in the hearts there will be unity between the employer and employed, and closed with a strong plea for universal unity.

Some necessary business was transacted, and the closing moments were most fittingly spent in a living silence wherein a prayer of thanksgiving for this remarkable meeting was voiced. M. P. T.

UNIVERSITY EXTENSION IN PHILADELPHIA.

THE University Extension Society has made announcement of the series of lectures that will be delivered during the coming autumn and winter in Association Hall. This will be the fourteenth season that this work has been carried on at 15th and Chestnut Streets. Twenty lectures are to be delivered on Third-day evenings, beginning with one on the 27th by Hamilton W. Mabie, LL. D., of The Outlook. In addition to his lecture there were short addresses on the relation of the Extension movement to the free library system. The Mayor presided, and the meeting served as the introduction not only to the lectures in Association Hall, but also to the sixty other University Extension lectures to be delivered in the various branches of the Free Library.

This opening lecture will be followed by six others beginning Eleventh month 3d, by Francis N. Thorpe, Ph. D., on "History and the Historical Novel." The series before the holidays will close with a single lecture on Twelfth month 15th, by William Garrott Brown on "Andrew Jackson and the New Democracy." After the holidays E. L. S. Horsburgh will deliver six illustrated lectures on the "French Revolution" beginning First month 5th, and six others on "The Age of Napoleon" beginning Second month 16th.

In addition to these evening lectures, there will be twelve Fifth-day afternoon lectures, from First month 7th to Third month 24th. The first six of these will be by E. L. S. Horsburgh, on "Renaissance Art," and the other six by Frederick H. Sykes, Ph. D., on "Victorian Poets." All these lectures will be illustrated.

Most of these lecturers have been heard often before by Philadelphia audiences. E. L. S. Horsburgh, however, has only been in Philadelphia on one occasion in the past, when he lectured at one of the Summer Meetings of the University Extension Society. He is staff lecturer in history and literature for the Oxford University Extension Society and for the American Society for the Extension of University Teaching. For twelve years he has given up all other occupation, and has employed himself altogether in University Extension lecturing. In this entire devotion of his time for so long a period to public lecturing, Mr. Horsburgh stands unique among University Extension lecturers in England.

THE latest record in the electric car high speed experiments in Germany was 130 2-5 miles an hour.

EDUCATIONAL.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE.

PROBABLY one of the most thoroughly enjoyed lectures, that was ever given in Parrish Hall, was delivered by Hamilton Wright Mabie, one of the editors of The Outlook, on Fourth-day Tenth month 21st. His subject was "Literature as a Personal Resource." He presented his subject in such a delightfully refreshing manner that though the lecture was long no one wearied of it. He spoke of Homer, and other great writers. It would be one requirement he would make, if he could, that every boy and girl should read the Odyssey, for the ups and downs of Ulysses are similar to those of the life of today. He spoke of his relations with Oliver Wendell Holmes; of the power of a good book; of the worthlessness of the poor novel. Tenth month 23d, Somerville held its regular meeting. The program was "An Old-fashioned School." There were spelling bees and many things pleasing and humorous. It was a very successful meeting. Eunomial Literary Society met and adjourned without taking up the literary exercises, till Second-day Tenth month 26th. On the 25th Dr. Benjamin Battin read a paper on the "Value of Silence." Silence is a power for settling the disturbed mind; in the silent thoughtful moments of life the will power, the strength of a character is formed and made stronger. Dr. Jesse H. Holmes spoke in meeting.

In the First-day morning Bible Class at the College, William S. Price spoke on the "Meaning of Work." He dwelt at length upon the evils of those systems which make man a mere automaton. Prof. Riversteiner, professor of Romance languages of Indiana University, will speak Fifth-day Tenth month 29th, 1903. His subject is, "The Prince of Spanish Letters." F. N. P.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

A ROUND-TABLE CONFERENCE of teachers of primary classes in the First-day Schools of Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting was held in the Parlor at Fifteenth and Race streets, on Sixth-day evening, the 23d. No effort was made to have a formal paper or address, but those present were urged to ask questions concerning their needs, and to present methods and devices which they had found effective. Experience had shown that the teacher should tell the moral and Bible stories rather than read them, that these must be within the grasp of the pupils' understanding, that the pupils must be questioned and re-questioned, and allowed to tell the stories themselves and even try to illustrate them, and that each teacher must adapt her lessons to her class rather than to follow any lesson or series of lessons arranged by other teachers.

Many teachers feel the desirability of concentrating on the Bible stories and lessons that our pupils may be better conversant therewith, also to require that Bible verses be memorized and remembered.

The use of the blackboard for drawing by hand or by stencil was urged, and the stitching of Bible pictures on cards, such as are used in the Kindergarten, has been found helpful. Cards and buttons containing Bible verses have been used with success. Helpful materials and devices can be found at the Church publication rooms, and the books suggested below can be obtained there, at the Unitarian Rooms on Twelfth street below Chestnut, or through the Friends' Book Association, 15th and Race streets.

The following books have been found helpful by teachers in primary classes of our First-day schools: "Childhood's Morning, for Kindergarten use in Sunday-school and Home," by Elizabeth G. Mumford; "Kindergarten Sunday-school," by Frederica Beard; "In the Child's World," by Emily Poulsson; "Boston Collection of Kindergarten Stories"; "Children of the Gospel Days," by William Worcester; "Child's Christ Tales," by Andrea Hofer Froude; "Every-day Life Parables," by Mrs. E. C. Wilson; "The Story Hour," by Kate Douglas Wiggin.

ABINGTON FIRST-DAY SCHOOL UNION.—Abington First-day School Union was held at Upper Dublin meeting house on Seventh-day, Tenth month 17th. The meeting was opened by Bible reading by Elizabeth Hollingsworth, superintendent of the Upper Dublin school, after which the minutes of the meeting held last Fourth month, at Abington, were read by the clerk, Frank Ball.

The reading of essay reports from the superintendents having charge of the schools which compose the Union, Abington, Byberry, Horsham, Gwynedd, Norristown, Plymouth, Quakertown, Ambler, and Upper Dublin, were then read, excepting Horsham, which gave a verbal report. All of these reports were encouraging, several of them showing increased attendance and added interest since the last Union.

A very fine recitation was given by the Gwynedd School. The Horsham school had a blackboard lesson. Charles Livezey spoke at length on the duty of teachers to feel that they are doing God's work. At the noon recess lunch was partaken of by about 300 persons, who were most kindly served by the Friends of Upper Dublin and Ambler.

After recess reports were read from the business and visiting committees and the program of exercises was taken up. It consisted of most excellent recitations, readings and class exercises. Papers on the question: "Should Friends' Principles and Discipline be Taught in our Secular Schools?" were read by members of Byberry, Norristown and Abington schools. It was felt that this had been a most helpful and interesting union and very well attended notwithstanding the rainy weather. The meeting adjourned to meet at Plymouth meeting the third Seventh-day in Fourth month. — [Doylestown Intelligencer.]

MOORESTOWN, N. J.—A regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association of Moorestown was held Tenth month 16th, 1903. The program was a paper by President Swain on "Nature and the Bible." He compared the Bible to a mountain peak standing strong and firm through all the ages. He said that it was necessary to make a careful study as of a painting, at first we saw but little in a masterpiece, but gradually its full worth and meaning were revealed to us and each hour spent in study of the Bible taught us new meanings and truths. We lose a great deal of the beauty of this Book of books, if we do not study nature in connection with it. Nothing is so important as that in the beginning was God, that every creation implies a creator and when we view the lowly things of every day, we must stop and think that back of it all lies some unseen power. Minds of the broadest culture are Christians and the study of nature leads us to a higher and better life. Astronomy is a profound religious teacher and should we only stop to think and reason we would always have that reverent feeling which causes us to live up to the best that is in us and look through nature up to nature's God.

There was a general discussion and after a brief silence the meeting adjourned. A. B. D., Sec.

LITERARY NOTES.

In Harper's Magazine for Eleventh month Professor Petrie describes the excavations in Egypt. He says that on the earliest sacred site of Abydos, the first capital of Egypt, temples had been piled one on the ruins of another until ten ages of building stood stacked together in about twenty feet depth of ruins. Each temple had become partly ruined after a few centuries, and then at last was pulled down, leaving a foot or two of the walls and foundations; and a new temple of a different plan was then erected on the ground. America is not old enough for this to be done even once; but London stands on a mound of over twenty feet of ruins, from which, he says, its past will some day be read as we now read that of Egypt.

Henry van Dyke, writing in Harper's Bazar of the college life of girls, says: "There is one good result which I firmly believe girls are going to get out of their collective life, and that is a fuller development of the sense of honor. This is a delicate subject. Every one knows that women are generally better than men. Their standards of purity and temperance and reverence and kindness and self-sacrifice are higher, and they are more in earnest about living up to them. But one thing is lacking—a clearer conception and a stronger sense of that fine flower of fair dealing which is called honor."

Lippincott's Magazine contains a suggestive story of a man who built his own monument; his name was Hiram Matthews and his monument was a double row of shade trees that arched above the village streets. He planted them in spite of jeers and was afterward blessed by his townspeople. In the same number Maud Howe gives a pleasing description of a private interview with the Queen of Italy.

IS N'T IT QUEER?

A LITTLE philosopher sat on a step,
And a deep, long sigh breathed he
Over the ways of grown-up folks—
Their inconsistency.

At night when the sun has dropped over the hill,
And the lamps are all lighted instead,
They say so impressively, "Now it is time
For small boys to be safe in bed."

And yet when you tumble and hurt you so much
They seem so astonished, they do,
If you whimper. They say, "Come, you shouldn't cry;
A grown-up and big boy like you!"

It's queer they never can think you are large,

At night when the dark's in the sky;

It's queer they never will think you are small,

When they know you are going to cry.

—Helen S. Daley in Youth's Companion.

Where the Record is Kept.

COULD the young but realize how soon they will become mere bundles of habits, they would give more heed to their conduct while in the plastic state. Every smallest stroke of virtue or of vice leaves its scar. The drunken man excuses himself from every fresh dereliction by saying, "I won't count this time." Well, he may not count it, and a kind heaven may not count it, but it is being counted, none the less. Down among the nerve cells and fibres the molecules are counting it, registering and storing it up, to be used against him when the next temptation comes. Nothing we ever do is, in strict scientific literalness, wiped out. Of course, this has its good side as well as its bad one. As we become permanent drunkards by so many separate drinks, so we become saints in the moral, and authorities and experts in the practical and scientific spheres, by so many separate acts and hours of work.—[Professor William James in his Text-book on Psychology.]

True Giving.

DR. MILLER tells the story of Henry Thornton, who was a most generous giver to good causes. A visitor called on him one day and asked for a special subscription for missions, and he made out a check for twenty-five dollars. Before the ink was dry a messenger boy came in with a telegram. Mr. Thornton opened it, and the visitor noticed that his face turned very pale and his hand trembled. He said to the visitor, "I have received terrible news. I have lost thousands of dollars. Give me back that check." It was hard to give it back, as, of course, the visitor expected to see it torn up. But Mr. Thornton, on receiving it, changed the twenty-five dollars to two hundred and fifty dollars, saying, "God has taught me that I may not much longer possess my property, and I must use it well." That man had chosen the true way to contentment. Contentment is always possible when we keep an open mind to be taught of God, and realize that in everything we are His stewards.—[Baptist Commonweath.]

CURRENT EVENTS.

WILLIAM E. H. LECKEY, the historian, died of heart disease on the 22d. The books on which his reputation rests are the "History of the Rise and Fall of Rationalism in Europe," the "History of European Morals," and "History of England in the Eighteenth Century." His "Democracy and Liberty," published in 1896, in which he attempted to "show up" Gladstone, had a wide circulation. Four years ago he published "The Map of Life, Conduct and Character," a philosophical volume, rich with impressions and keen observations. He once tried verse, but was no poet. His first work, "Leaders of Public Opinion in England," appeared anonymously while he was yet an undergraduate. This book was widely read and appeared in several editions, the later ones with his name. Almost the last work he did was to write an introduction for a new edition of this first work, which is to appear in England and America this year. He is associated most naturally with the group of writers and public men that includes Justin McCarthy and James Bryce. He was graduated from Trinity College, Dublin, in 1859. He was elected member of Parliament for Dublin University in 1896, and became prominent in the councils of the new Liberal-Unionist party.

PREMIER ZANARDELLI and the entire Italian Cabinet resigned on the 20th. The retirement of the Premier was expected on account of his ill-health, but it was not expected that his retirement would affect the other members. This ministry dates from the early part of 1901, having undergone one reorganization in Sixth month last, when Zanardelli wished to retire but was persuaded to continue. Former Minister of the Interior Giolitti has been asked to form a new cabinet, this choice having been suggested by the ex-Premier, whom the King holds in the highest regard.

The Cabinet of Norway resigned on the 21st in consequence of a decision in favor of the opposition in a disputed election case. A coalition cabinet made up of Conservatives and Moderate Liberals will be formed, King

The perfect conformation of this make to the natural lines of the body (vest and drawers woven into one garment) gives it an ever increasing popularity. Buttoning the garment across the bust, above the corset, does away with the discomfort of having the buttons pressed into the flesh by the corset.

We have secured a large lot of these garments, in seconds, which we offer at very low prices. The imperfections are slight—do not affect either the durability or the comfort:

- $1.00 quality, heavy white ribbed cotton at 65c
- $1.00 quality, white or natural ribbed merino at 65c
- $1.25 quality, white ribbed merino at 87½c
- $1.50 quality, white or natural ribbed merino at $1.00
- $2.00 quality, white ribbed wool at $1.25
- $2.50 quality, natural ribbed wool at $1.50

Also a line of Children's Oneita Suits in natural merino; all sizes from 2 to 8—here at 65c each.

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD TRAIN PORTERS.

A popular feature of the through trains of the Pennsylvania Railroad which leave New York daily for the West at 7.55 a. m. and 1.55 p. m., and leave Pittsburg daily for the East at 3.00 a. m. and 7.30 a. m., are the train porters stationed in the day coaches.

Their duty consists of keeping the cars clean and rendering whatever service passengers may require. The Pullman porter has long since demonstrated his usefulness; the Pennsylvania Railroad train porter serves the ordinary coach passenger in the same capacity as the Pullman porter serves those who ride in parlor and sleeping cars.

The day coaches on the above-mentioned trains, as well as those on trains leaving New York at 5.55 p. m. daily for the West and leaving Pittsburg at 7.10 p. m. daily for the East, are equipped with lavatories, in connection with which the services of train porters are especially convenient.

A CURE FOR CRIME.

A WRITER in the North American Review asserts that manual training is almost as good a preventive of crime as vaccination is of smallpox.

"What per cent. of the prisoners under your care have received any manual training beyond some acquaintance with farming?" a Northern man asked the warden of a Southern penitentiary.

"Not one per cent," replied the warden.

"Have you no mechanics in prison?"

"Only one mechanic; that is, one man who claims to be a house-painter."

"Have you any shoemakers?" asked the visitor.

"Never had a shoemaker."

"Have you any tailors?"

"Never had a tailor."

"Any printers?"

"Never had a printer."

"Any carpenters?"

"Never had a man in this prison that could draw a straight line."

REVENGE may be sweet, but it is apt to curdle.—[Selected.]

Save Money

Even if it be but little at a time.

IT IS ASTONISHING How rapidly small sums regularly put aside increase in a good Savings Bank. $1.00 a week deposited in The Bowers Savings Bank, at compound interest, in five years, grows to $286. Ten years, $627. In twenty years, $1514. In forty years, $4,544. These are figures to think about!

The Bowers Savings Bank

NEW YORK

Is the Largest Savings Bank in the World. It has nearly

Too much to be easily comprehended, and yet it would like to help you to save, even a little, but all you can. IT IS A MUTUAL BANK. There are no stockholders; the trustees get no direct or indirect pecuniary pay for their services. It was incorporated seventy years ago by a number of benevolent men of the city of New York, among whom were several Friends, and it has ever since had a greater or less number of members of the Society of Friends in its board of trustees. To make it easy for those who live anywhere to put their savings in a safe bank, it has recently started a system of through which anyone may avail of its facilities for safe-guarding money, and returning a fair rate of dividends, as if the bank was "just around the corner."

*Send for a copy of the new booklet, "Banking by Mail." It will tell you all about it. You should have it anyhow, whether you wish to open an account now or at some future time.

GOOD WORDS FOR 1903.

XLV.

It is perhaps our most urgent present necessity to find—or, having found, to maintain in its purity—some method of approaching the Divine Presence which shall not involve anything contrary to absolute truthfulness.

CAROLINE STEPHEN.

In Friends' Quarterly Examiner for Tenth month, 1903.

DIVINE VISITATION.

"WILT thou not visit me?

The plant beside me feels thy gentle dew,
And every blade of grass I see
From the deep earth its quickening moisture drew.

"Wilt thou not visit me?

Thy morning calls on me with cheering tone;
And every hill and tree
Lend but one voice,—the voice of thee alone.

"Come for I need thy love

More than the flowers the dew or grass the rain;
Come gently as thy holy dove,
And let me in thy sight rejoice to live again.

"I will not hide from them

When thy storms come, though fierce may be their wrath,
But bow with leafy stem,
And, strengthened, follow on thy chosen path.

"Yes thou wilt visit me;

Nor plant nor tree thine eyes delight so well,
As when, from sin set free,
My spirit loves with thine in peace to dwell."
—Jones Very.

THE VALUE OF SILENCE.¹

In the afternoon of day after day, year in, year out, an old man was wont to sit in his arm chair, overlooking a landscape in northern Germany. The greatest productive intellect the world has ever known sat in absolute quiet after a long, hard day's work—for the wise man, Immanuel Kant, had learned the value of silence.

There are some who enter this academic community who were not reared in the Society of Friends, who were never accustomed to the periods of silence, who have had, here for the first time, the privilege of quiet communion. For it is a great privilege to be alone with one's self and God, knowing that in the common worship round about, other souls are moved with the same impulse. And this is the purpose of our periods of silence in the First-day meeting and in the morning assembly—to open up the windows of our hearts and souls to the Divine Light.

One of man's first duties is to know himself, to study his innate qualities of mind, his will-power, capacity, and effectiveness. This power of self-analysis is not given equally to all and it must in all cases be developed. In no way can it better be trained than in the regularly recurring silent hour. For then it is that the soul must lay bare its inmost secrets, and seek to find its proper place in the harmony of the universe.

How especially important it is that we learn thus to know ourselves and to take counsel of the Heavenly Father at that time of life when we are educating ourselves for future work in the world, and when trying to decide in what sphere that work shall lie. One goes eagerly to parents and friends for advice and comfort. Yet that which he seeks can be obtained most surely and in greatest measure by calm introspection and communion with the Great Adviser of all.

Those who have learned this method of studying the problem of themselves and the outer world have suddenly realized that they appreciate quality in work and thought rather than quantity, that their thought can never be anything but honest and faithful, being in the presence of the Divine,—that they test all truth by the final test in their own minds and hearts, rather than depend on the authority of others,—and that, above all, they develop an independence of character, thought and action far beyond that which comes from the impulse of emotional worship or of any outside stimulus.

As with every good thing in the world, there may be a danger in the silent hour; we may let our thoughts ramble at random, and thus weaken our intellectual and moral natures. But if the thought that we are seeking to discover our rightful places in eternity, our relation to the Divine, be kept in mind, this is little likely to occur.

Some have never learned to use the hour of silence, some, knowing their own shortcomings, are even afraid to look deeply into their own souls; yet this very discontent and restlessness of mind can be cured only by the calmness and content which follow a clear insight into the depths of one's own character. This which great philosophers, poets, and men of action have always told us is a fact we can easily verify for ourselves.

Wealth, heroic action, fame, great intellectual achievement are in store for but few of us; but like all the really great and simple things of life, the power of introspection in the hour of silence is open to us all.

When once we have learned properly to use this faculty, we have laid a sure and permanent foundation for the greatest blessing man can know—a religious spirit in communion with the Divine Father.

GREAT souls have wills; feeble ones have only wishes.—[Chinese Proverb.]

BALTIMORE YEARLY MEETING.

THIRD-DAY.

THE nominating committee reported the names of Friends selected to serve on several committees; these lists were separately united with by the yearly meeting. The time for standing committees to serve was limited to three years.

Baltimore's Committee on Isolated Members reported that every monthly meeting had sent last year's minutes to its isolated members and that several had also sent letters, or copies of the new discipline or both. This committee was instructed to appoint four of its members to serve on the Joint Committee of the several yearly meetings.

The Committee on Indian Affairs reported that since a more general interest has been manifested in the rights of the Indians, Friends have been less active in their behalf. Aid has been given by the committee to an Indian woman to obtain a clear title to her land. In the work that it has done the committee has found the Indian Bureau ready to cooperate. It was stated that there is a fund for the use of this committee with an income of over $200 a year, and that Baltimore Yearly Meeting has had a standing committee on Indian Affairs since 1795.

The report of Friends' Press Association (composed of women Friends) alluded feelingly to the loss sustained by the death of its chairman, Isabella Tyson. The report stated that an open letter had been sent to the editors of a large number of four- and six-page country papers urging them to keep their columns clean. This letter had also been sent to isolated members asking them to send it to newspapers, and some of them had responded that it was a great pleasure to be able to aid in meeting work. Over 5,000 reports and letters had been sent to editors and associations, and the cooperation of churches had been asked in this work. This report was warmly commended.

The treasurer was directed to pay $216 to the treasurer of the General Conference. Friends were asked to aid in the effort to obtain a complete set of minutes of the yearly meeting, to be bound and preserved for reference; the years before 1832 are especially desired. The reading of the epistle from Illinois completed the morning session.

In the afternoon the report of the Philadelphia Committee was read, covering the departments of peace, temperance, purity, demoralizing publications, gambling and kindred vices, prevention of cruelty to animals, work among colored people, mission work among women and children, and equal rights for women. The greatest temperance victory reported during the year was the placing of Cecil county, Maryland, under prohibition for four years. The movement in Baltimore to obtain signatures of Friends to a total abstinence pledge was commended to other meetings. A special report of a sub-committee on demoralizing advertisements will be found on page 713. The sum of $350 was appropriated for next year's work in addition to a balance on hand of $109.

After the report of the Representative Committee, a memorial was read for Jesse Hoge, a minister of Goose Creek Monthly Meeting, which concluded with these words: "There remains to us the memory of a simple-minded, pure-hearted man whose aim in life was to be good and do good." Many Friends spoke in loving remembrance of him, reminding one another of the source of his strength and testifying that in all his dealings with his fellowmen Jesse Hoge was the embodiment of love and justice.

FOURTH-DAY.

The report of the committee on Friends' Home was read showing that The Darlington has not answered the purposes for which it was intended and has not been self-sustaining. As the present building is not suited to the needs of such a home and no better one is available, the committee was authorized to close the home at such time as seems best.

The Committee on Education reported three schools under the care of Baltimore, Sandy Spring and Menallen Monthly Meetings respectively, with a total enrollment of 272 pupils, 73 of whom are members of the Society. The school in Baltimore has an increased attendance and is doing excellent work. A discussion followed this report as to whether it is more advisable to place young children who must leave home in a boarding-school or in a private family where they can attend a day school. Jonathan K. Taylor, having had experience of both ways, advised the latter.

The first four queries with their answers were read. No deficiencies in love and unity were reported and there were few abatements concerning intoxicants and tobacco, excepting that there are still a number of Friends who use the latter. Attention was called to the fact that cider is intoxicating and that in some Friendly neighborhoods this fall the manufacture and sale of cider as a beverage has been demoralizing to the community.

A communication from London Yearly Meeting entitled "A Plea for Humanity" was read without discussion and referred to the Philanthropic Committee. The reading of the epistle from Ohio closed the day's session.

The afternoon was devoted to the annual meeting of the First-day School Association, over which Eli M. Lamb presided. Interesting reports were read from the different schools. In one neighborhood where there are no Friends' children a mission school has been established. Another school is attended by a number of students from a Dunkard college. The York school reported fourteen in the Bible class.

A discussion followed concerning the best manner of securing reports. Mordecai Bartram described the system of First-day School Unions existing throughout Philadelphia Yearly Meeting and the method of reporting now in use.

The epistles from the other associations and the one prepared in reply were felt to be particularly good. As John J. Cornell said of them, they told of the work done in the schools and of their aims and aspirations without any attempt at preaching.

In the meeting for worship on Fourth-day evening Friends were reminded that this is a transition period for our Society. Many of the old customs have disappeared and all were admonished in making the changes to keep true to Friends' principles and testimonies, and "Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good." An elderly Friend compared his religious experience to a stream of water. As he sat on the banks of the stream a little water bubbled up out of the ground and added its portion to the stream. The stream flowed on and was increased by others. Simultaneously he felt the Divine Spirit bubbling up in his soul.

On Fifth-day the remaining queries and their answers were considered. The eighth query called forth earnest remarks on oppression in its various forms. Friends were urged to discourage boys' brigades and a desire was expressed that military training might be eliminated from the curriculum of agricultural colleges.

Each monthly meeting was advised to appoint a committee in accordance with the new Discipline, to consider the membership and to see whether there are those who are waiting for Friendly care.

The report of the visiting committee and the appropriation of $200 for the work were approved. The report of the nominating committee and of the treasurer, also the reply to the epistles were read and adopted.

The meeting closed with a feeling of gratitude for the privileges that had been enjoyed, and the beautiful order and harmony that had prevailed. The young were urged to be more faithful in the attendance of their meetings, and all were reminded that more social visiting might be productive of good results.

The half-hour devotional meetings held each morning before the business sessions were well attended, and brief and helpful thoughts were uttered by many Friends whose voices were not heard in the larger meeting. There were also many intervals of living silence, and those who were privileged to attend were spiritually refreshed and encouraged.

FELLOWSHIP IN THE LIGHT.¹

"If we walk in the light, as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another."—I. John, i., 7.

WHAT better motto for our Summer gathering could we have than these words, which come to us from very early Christian literature, from one whose soul was flooded with heavenly light and love? We are longing for the light of truth; we desire nothing more than to open our souls to the daylight; we fear nothing from the most searching inquiry, being assured that God is Light, and that truth is always and everywhere of God.

In thus seeking to "walk in the light" there opens before us a "fellowship one with another," deeper than we can possibly experience by the blind following of tradition. Even if for a time our path is lonely,—if we are called on to part company with some of those we love,—yet we shall be joined closely to those who are traveling by the same road. For truth once discovered is the same for all; whereas what separates us is clinging to our own personal opinions—unwillingness to lay aside what we choose to think. To put from us prejudice and preconception, to seek humbly and reverently to know the facts, is in very truth to yield our intellects to God, and thereby to break down the barriers that separate us from His universal Truth. Reception of the new light which is falling on the pages of the Bible is bringing close together Christians of many different sects and creeds.

But there is a deeper sense in which "walking in the light" yields "fellowship one with another," and we are proving it at these Summer gatherings. The light which flooded the soul of this disciple of the Master was something much richer and more penetrating than a mere intellectual grasp of truth. It was a spiritual vision, an inward and personal unveiling of truth and beauty and love, which had come to him through his relation to the Crucified One. It was something that broke down the walls of isolation not only of his mind but of his inmost heart and will, and opened his whole being to the light of God. It was the surrender of his personality that brought him quickened powers,—as he lost his own life he found it,—when purified in heart his eyes were opened to see God. Hence we cannot do justice to his thought, however difficult it may be for some of us fully to understand it, if we leave out of sight the clause that follows: "and the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanse us from all sin."

It is the mud of self-will and of our own imaginings that keeps out the light; the purpose of our Father is to make us clean like the mountain brooks, penetrated through and through by His heavenly sunshine. As our spiritual eyes are thus opened we shall find we are not alone, but in a land where kindred spirits dwell: "truly our fellowship is with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ;" but it is a fellowship also with other souls that are walking in the same light.

This fellowship some of us here already know, and it is open to us all.

There is a larger fellowship, with human life itself,—and especially with those who suffer sorrow and privation,—which will be the joy of those who are walking in the light; but of which I cannot now speak further. We must not, however, fail to note that the fellowship to which we are called will often be a fellowship of suffering. It is so now: there are those who had hoped to be with us who are prevented by the illness of those they love; and the dear friend and teacher, who has come across the Atlantic to instruct us, is about to give his message in the midst of crushing grief. Our hearts are tendered in sympathy with these; and we may rightly join these deep and tragic tones of human life with that thought of the blood of Christ of which just now we were speaking. The Cross of our Lord reveals to us the redemptive power of suffering, the purifying efficacy of pain willingly borne for others; it impresses on our thoughts the tragedy of human life, and yet opens before us a vision of its meaning.

We need the reminder that it is through tribulation we enter the kingdom of God; that it is not to be won by a course of ice cream and tennis, by things easy and pleasant to the taste. We need to learn more thoroughly the lesson of the Cross—that the cleansing of our hearts from sin, which is to clear our spiritual vision and bring us into the fellowship of the light, is wrought at the cost of the blood and tears and agony of the Son of God Himself,—of a passion in which we are called to share; and we may share it willingly, knowing that the fellowship of His sufferings is also the fellowship of His life.

RELIGIOUS PREPARATION FOR COLLEGE.

It is not dogmatism or bigotry that lies behind the startling but altogether sane suggestion of Chancellor McCracken of the New York University in a recent address to the student body under him when he says:

"I wish we could require from every freshman a Sunday-school diploma that would certify that he knew by heart the ten commandments, the sermon on the mount, a church catechism of some kind, a score of Scripture psalms and best classic hymns.

"This university will join any association of universities and colleges that will demand this as an entrance requirement. So much as in us lies, we will make the college a place for preserving and strengthening reverence for things divine."

It is a long way from the interpretation of religion as dogma to the interpretation of religion in terms of culture and of morality. The Bible as a handbook of dogmatic theology has been eliminated from most systems of education, private or public, but the Bible as a great literary storehouse, as a handbook of the higher life, a text-book in the history of morals and religion, awaits its day in the educational world, and that day is surely to come.—[Unity.]

THE ETERNAL SPIRIT.

[The following extracts from a recent address of George A. Gordon at an anniversary meeting of the Congregational Church in Boston were sent us by Hannah A. Plummer, of Chicago, who says, "A friend brought the address to me thinking I would be pleased to see how the faith in the Holy Spirit was being preached in the churches. So I was and thought other readers of the INTELLIGENCER would be glad to see so much of it at least."]

In the world of religious faith, as elsewhere, the opposing forces of conservatism and radicalism act and re-act on each other, and progress is the issue of the collision. Christianity is the revelation of God through the divine humanity of Jesus. No man is intellectually justified in denying the miracles of Jesus. He does not know enough to deny. No man has a right to make the glory of Christianity depend upon the miracle.

If the Bible appears to be no longer an infallible book, it is that men may come to know the Divine inspirer of it. The Bible seems to me to have gained immeasurably in the process of scientific investigation. In the lyric and epic utterance of supreme souls one still hears the accent of the Holy Ghost. Theories about the Bible are born and die, but the Bible in its really great books remains what it has always been, the monumental witness to the presence in man of the Holy Ghost. The religion of Jesus Christ is after all the religion of the Holy Ghost.

The church is the church of the risen Lord. It began in the consciousness of the risen and reigning Christ. It can never be, without outrage upon history, without revolt from Christian reason, the church of the dead Christ. There comes in upon us with this consciousness, if we will but open the gates, the floods of the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit thus becomes the hope of the church. If we have the Holy Spirit, he will guide us into all truth; he will recover to faith and life the truth that the church may from time to time lose. Thinking, believing, doing, living in the strength of the Holy Ghost,—there is no hope save in that experience; and for the soul and for the church in that experience, there is nothing but hope. The recorded Gospel, the recorded Christ, we leave behind as the swift years roll, as the great centuries pass.

That divine life in Galilee and in Judea is far away from our time. We may weep that it is forever receding from the successive generations of men; but we must not forget that it is a part of the history of the race, that it is the abiding and the supreme human memorial, and the glorious deep of the Holy Ghost goes forward with us. It is under the keel of the church. Its currents are all toward good. The secret of existence for the individual Christian and for the whole body of Christians is in a life in the life of God, in a life that cannot be torn from a fellowship with him. The Christ of yesterday and the Christ of to-morrow are in the keeping of the Christ of to-day. The divine past and the divine future are safe, utterly safe, when held in the divine present, "God is our refuge, a present help in time of trouble." "Therefore we will not fear, though the earth be removed and the sea roar and be troubled."

The planet goes forever forward, but it takes with it its atmosphere. Let the moving church take with it faith, the experience, the protection, the infinite gift of the Holy Ghost. The church which shall journey onward, rolled in the atmosphere of the Holy Ghost, shall continue living, fruitful, beautiful, and to it God shall disclose more and more of the splendor of his universe.

You say "Creed"; I say "Faith." A creed at best is but a sorry caricature of a faith.—[British Friend.]

CAST forth thy act, thy word, into the ever-living, ever-working universe. It is a seed grain that cannot die.—[Carlyle.]

FOR nearly nineteen centuries there has been on the part of Christendom a looking backward to Him who was personally on earth as Jesus, the Christ; and too generally such an exclusive looking backward as to amount to a blindness to his present and daily appearance to the hearts of men,—those living appearances of the risen Lord by his Spirit which He was so earnest to assure his followers of, in his parting language pleading that they take notice of his being "with them all the days, even unto the end of the world."—[Editorial in Friend, Philadelphia.]

NEW TESTAMENT LESSON.—No. 40.

PETER.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Be ye therefore of sound mind and be sober unto prayer: above all things being fervent in your love among yourselves; for love covereth a multitude of sins.—I. Peter, iv., 7, 8.

Before study of Lesson read I. Peter, ii., 1-10; iv., 1-19; II. Peter, iii., 1-9.

In his position among the leaders of the early Christian Church Peter paid the penalty of his vacillating and uncertain character. His faithlessness to his Master at the time of the arrest will not have been forgotten. He was shifting and unreliable in his dealings with the question of Gentile Christianity (Gal., ii., 11-13). This weakness could not but discredit him with both parties to a certain extent. The Jewish party turned from him to James, while Paul was, of course, pre-eminent among the Gentiles. But we must not let these failings of the apostle hide from us his real greatness and attractiveness. It is plain that he was too easily influenced by others, and was thus easily led into serious inconsistencies; but this quality often results directly from too much trust in fellowmen, or from an affection which makes contest almost insupportable. Peter was drawn in a spirit of love to the Gentile Christians of Paul's church at Antioch. His experiences with Jesus had led him to be somewhat careless of the minutiae of the law, and he did not hesitate to eat with them. When his friends arrived from Jerusalem their personal influence overbore that of the new acquaintances, and he deferred to their prejudices, thus rightly subjecting himself to Paul's condemnation. We hear little of him after these events; even tradition has little to tell beyond the doubtful story that he suffered martyrdom at Rome in the terrible persecutions of Nero. But we have in the New Testament two letters supposed to be from his hand; and the Gospel of Mark, believed to be the oldest of the Gospels and the historic foundation of Matthew and Luke, is asserted by Papias to be based on his memories of Jesus as written down by Mark. From these and such other evidence as is available we may suppose that Peter carried on extensive and presumably successful mission work in various parts of Syria and Asia Minor. It is probable that he addressed himself chiefly to Jews at first; but he could not fail to be impressed by the successful work of Paul among the outsiders, and he may very likely have turned increasingly to them in his later years. His letter to the churches of Asia Minor (I. Pet., i., 1) shows that he made no distinction between the two classes of Christians. It is plain that he regards all those who have accepted the Messiah as the real Israel, the true heirs of the promises made to the fathers. We must not overlook the fact that the companions mentioned in his letters are Mark, associated in Acts with the work of Paul and Barnabas, and Silvanus (possibly Silas, a companion of Paul), a Greek. Under such conditions Peter would be considered an apostate by all orthodox Jews, and his position would be a doubtful one among those who considered themselves loyal Jews, as well as Christians. It is easy to understand, therefore, how he ceased to be the leader of the church at Jerusalem (Acts, i., 15; ii., 14, etc.), and why his labors are associated by tradition with the western churches.

The first epistle of Peter was written not long after the anonymous epistle to the Hebrews, considered in our last lesson. Persecution was beginning to be felt, but had not apparently reached great proportions among those to whom the letter was addressed. The conditions of these churches were widely different from those implied in "Hebrews." They had not had many of the leaders among them at any time, and were therefore not so much affected by their death. Moreover, the matter of death among the faithful had already been met by Paul, and doubtless his letters to the Thessalonians, or their substance, had been disseminated widely among the Gentile Christians everywhere. Not being Jews, they did not feel the pressure back to the mother church, which probably weakened very much the churches of Palestine.

The letter is simply a message of faith and cheer to fellow-Christians under trial and persecution. In widely different language he presents again the now familiar idea that suffering and death are not signs of God's displeasure. He urges them to be kindly, truthful, pure, and points to the example of Jesus. Behold, he was crucified, yet his life was a great success. Be not therefore disturbed if ye also are obliged to suffer, to partake of Christ's sufferings; they are to the end that ye may rejoice with exceeding joy. His advice to servants, evidently slaves, does not fully suit our time; but he still looked for a speedy end of the world and made no effort to provide for a permanent arrangement (I. Pet., iv., 7).

Peter's second letter was probably written in the decade following the fall of Jerusalem. With it we must associate the brief epistle of Jude, one of the surviving brothers of Jesus and James the Just. The letter of Peter seems to be an amended copy or expansion of Jude's epistle. Both are directed against certain false teachers, who had been leading the brethren astray by the vicious theory that the "freedom from the law" induced by their faith renders sin impossible; that it includes freedom from moral restraints. Paul describes such evil teachers as those "holding a form of godliness, but having denied the power thereof." The recipients of these letters—probably churches of Northern Syria—are affectionately warned of the danger of this teaching, and as earnestly exhorted to maintain self-control.

TOPICS: The Character of Peter. Peter's Life and Death. Value of Epistles of Cheer. Antinomianism.

A BIOGRAPHER of Samuel Bowley said of him "The love of man was a deep, abiding, and ever active element in his character. It had its foundation in a firm religious belief in the universal Fatherhood of God, and the consequent universal Brotherhood of Man. It was the old Quaker faith investing all men with highest grandeur and equal rights. . . . The lowest and vilest were not to be despised; all were capable of glorious elevation."

BELIEVING IN GOODNESS.

We say that we believe in God and His goodness, that we believe He is present everywhere and rules the universe. How far do we really believe it? Is it a matter of creed with us, a matter of saying so and thinking so; or do we really believe in goodness and that there is a mighty power that makes for goodness in men and in the whole universe?

It is a very common thing to hear a man, himself unswervingly conscientious in business, talk in a matter of course way, even in the presence of his own children, of the tricks and open or half-concealed dishonesty of business, as if these were a necessary part of all business. He will listen to his boys as they take it for granted in their talk of men and affairs that successful business is for the most part a game of bluff and that the man who acts strictly in accordance with right cannot expect to be any more than ordinarily successful. He will listen to this and acquiesce in it. You may, any day, hear young men in conversation over the lunch tables take the same point of view—young men who carry on their own affairs along strictly honest lines and who would not hesitate a moment in choosing an honest course, though they knew it would mean loss, rather than a dishonest one that would lead to gain. They know that they earnestly try to be honest themselves and they know other men who are honest. They also know from the newspapers and from the talk of the town, as well as from their own observation, of rascally doings in business and of tricky men who succeed. In forming their theories of business life why should they prefer to base them on the latter cases, even though they are the ones that are talked about and written about, rather than on their own experience in honest business and on what they know of honest success among the business men of their acquaintance.

As a matter of fact there is more goodness in the business world and among men who are called worldly than some good people are in the habit of attributing to them, and we shall usually come nearer the truth when we are guessing at motives that we really know nothing about, if we attribute good motives than if we attribute bad ones, for the universe is good at heart, and goodness and integrity are to be found everywhere in it. Those of us who know ourselves to be good and honest or trying truly to be so as far as in us lies ought not to think that such as we are rare in the world.

But even supposing that the honest man is rather an oddity, yet no one will deny that he is to be found. Then why not hold him up to our children if we really believe in him and desire to see more like him? Even if we do not believe much in goodness, if we honestly think there is only a little of it in the world, it would be better to exalt that little rather than industriously to exalt the badness that so persistently thrusts itself upon us.

In considering the "state of Society" at a recent quarterly meeting, as reported in our last issue, attention was called to our plain meeting-houses and the effect their simplicity must have on the quality of our meetings. It was thought that "if our homes, also, were as simple and required less attention, less worry and care to maintain than they do, perhaps we then would not find it so necessary to seek relief and relaxation in amusements that appear at least to raise question." In this connection an article in the British Friend for Tenth month is of interest. It is entitled "In Praise of Poverty." The writer taking as his text from Professor James's book on the "Varieties of Religious Experience," "We have grown literally afraid to be poor," says, "It is impossible to over-estimate the value to a child of having been brought up in a home where the 'simple life' is being not talked about but lived, where from his earliest years his highest aspiration is to 'help.' Let him go through life with the same aspiration, and a very blessed life may be his." And again, "If all who profess to follow the Master would be willing to live a life of simplicity for His sake, the problem of poverty in our large towns would soon be solved. If there were only one such family in every village, living in a simple cottage home, mixing in a kindly neighborly way with those around them, such a home might be a centre of light and high influence. Its perfect cleanliness and daintiness would in itself, without a word said, preach a much needed lesson to the women. They would unconsciously learn numberless other lessons,—of gentle kindly manners, of the wise management of children, of love of books and music, and all elevating pursuits."

ANOTHER suggestion made at the same quarterly meeting is worthy of more than passing notice—that "as the queries at present seem to be limited to matters pertaining to the personal lives of our members and to the conduct of their affairs, it might be useful to extend them by adding a query relative to what the Society is doing to give better comprehension of our principles among our own members and to extend their influence outside."

It may not be that we need to add a new query—a missionary query—but we ought to remember in answering the queries we have that we are not clear, for instance in regard to drunkenness, if we have merely refrained from drinking and from the sale of harmful drinks; that it is quite as important that Friends do all in their power to stop the smoking of cigarettes by school boys as that they themselves refrain from the use of tobacco. It is not enough that the members of a meeting have formed certain principles good to live by and do live by them, if they withdraw themselves from the rest of the world and are not eager to bring their good news to those about them.

Let us not wait to get a new query into our Disciplines. The spirit of it is necessarily implied in each one of those we have, and in considering them let us examine ourselves as to whether we are letting the light we have shine as did the early Christian apostles, the early Friends, as do many of our Christian neighbors, and as we ourselves are more and more waking up to the importance of doing.

The editor of the British Friend has been taking a vacation in Switzerland and Italy and a letter from him appears in the issue for Tenth month with the title "Under Sunny Skies." Among the book reviews of this issue is one on "The Subliminal Self" by John William Graham, a review of F. W. H. Myers' "Human Personality and its Survival of Bodily Death." Students of these subjects will be interested also in a review of this book that appears in the Hibbert Journal for Ninth month, which is not in agreement with F. W. H. Myers' position.

Other articles of especial interest in the British Friend are "The Boys' Brigades and Quaker Principles" by H. D. Rowntree and J. B. Priestman, the "Roots of Quaker Ministry" and the second of a series of articles on "The Birthright Member."

A VALUED Friend has called our attention to an inexcusable slip in the report of Mansfield Young Friends' Association in our issue of Tenth month 24th (page 684) where "Marmaduke Stephen" appears, which should be Marmaduke Stephenson or Stevenson, the latter spelling being preferable.

The new cable from Emden, Germany, to Fayal, Azores, which is the first section of the second cable between Germany and New York, has just been completed.

COMMUNICATIONS.

OUR SILENT MEETINGS.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

THE various articles in the FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER on this subject and our ministry are always of keen interest to me.

If we would but remember that it is more blessed to give than to receive, how great will be our reward, the bitterness of silence will give way to the blessing of speech, however broken or humble may be the word or thought we have to lay before the meeting; let us do it humbly and modestly. If a large meeting, or our own familiar meeting is embarrassing, search out some little country meeting of strangers, where our visit and our halting message will always be most kindly received. How often I remember a visit to Devonshire House Meeting, London. At the beginning a woman Friend, who sat at the head of the meeting, arose and read a few verses from a small Testament; it seemed to strike a keynote for the entire meeting, as after that there were some fifteen or twenty persons who arose to speak.

While I enjoy and appreciate the beauty of a silent meeting, I do not believe it good for us as a religious organization. The ministry of Jesus was not a silent one, in fact it was intensely active, in word and in deed, at home and abroad, in story and illustrations of the most marvelous beauty, let us indeed follow the Master's example.

MACAULAY ON WILLIAM PENN.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

I am reading for the second time (the first many years ago) Macaulay's "England." Although of friendly stock on the mother's side, he is very bitter against them, particularly William Penn. In the appendix is a note or notes by Hepworth Dixon in defense of William Penn. Some years ago my cousin, Samuel M. Janney, defended him against Macaulay's charges. Can you tell me where I can find what he wrote on the subject. Your attention will much oblige your friend, WARWICK P. MILLER.

Spencerville, Md., Tenth month 12th, 1903.

[Samuel M. Janney's review of Macaulay's treatment of William Penn is found in the xxii chapter of his Life of Penn. The last chapter of Dixon's Life of Penn also discusses in detail Macaulay's charges.—EDITORS.]

THE VISION OF THOMAS SAY.

In a private letter from John William Graham he asks for information that the present editors are unable to give, except that the original article was signed L. M. C. instead of M. C. as in the reprint. If any of our readers are possessed of any knowledge of this vision of Thomas Say further than is given in the article referred to, we shall be glad to hear from them. Here is what J. W. G. says:—

"I am sending the account of the Vision of Thomas Say to the Society for Psychological Research. They want to know the source from which the FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER originally got it. I think it a very impressive and important story; and very like one or two others of its type."

OLD CLOTHES WANTED AT AIKEN.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

DEAR FRIENDS:—While those who can spare five hundred dollars for our two great needs (blacksmith and engine), are considering, I make a special appeal to those who can only give old clothes. Our customers are saying, "Your store is running down, we used to get such things." This hurts us. There are so many great bargains North, a few dollars spent up there in children's clothing and shoes would be a great help here. No doubt many firms there would give a little, or at lower prices if some one would ask them. Will some of you do it and thus help your friend,

MARTHA SCHOFIELD.

NOTES.

WRITING of the Woodbrooke permanent settlement in the Friend (London) for Tenth month 16th, Joshua Rowntree says, "There are, as I understand, likely to be eleven to fifteen of us of both sexes in residence in the first week, with an accession of some attenders at the classes from outside.

Friends and those in general sympathy with their aims and actions are mainly busy people, and but few can set apart months for special study. But when one considers the years given, and rightly given to ordinary university work, it does not seem unreasonable to expect that some students may finish their mental training by the insight into some of the ways both of adding to it, and of applying it, that ought to be obtainable at Woodbrooke.

Again, which of [the 2,500 Friends teaching in First-day schools] does not wish for a pause now and again from teaching, with a chance of learning instead, both from an inspiring teacher like Rendel Harris, a richly supplied library, and, not least, from personal visitation to the most varied and efficient schools, clubs and institutes to be found in the Society? Yet further are there not many quiet workers, each in his or her own way, who may be glad of an occasional retreat into congenial . . . fellowship. . . . The conditions of modern life, the necessity laid upon us to provide more equality of opportunity for our members, seem to me to point to Woodbrooke almost as a necessity of the future. But because we are as yet few, and pretty firmly set in our ways, time and patience must be given as well as faith and love to the new institution."

The issue of the Friend (London), for Tenth month 9th, is a special enlarged edition devoted almost entirely to Foreign Missions in honor of the Friends' Foreign Mission Conference held the last week in Ninth month. The editorial is on The Aim of Foreign Missions. An account is given of the large meeting at Devonshire House to which Friends had gathered to bid farewell to their missionaries who were about to leave for various fields: Nine to India, one to Madagascar, two to China, two to Syria, one to Ceylon, and a committee of three appointed by the Friends' Foreign Mission Board to visit the China Mission. An account is given of the Friends' Missionary Exhibition held in the Women's Yearly Meeting-house in Bishopsgate street. The Conference of the F. F. M. A. was held at Devonshire House, with Joseph Storrs Fry in the chair at the opening session. Among those who took an active part were Henry Stanley Newman, editor of the Friend, J. B. Hodgkin, Albert J. Crossfield, Gulielma Crossfield, Dr. William Wilson, Arthur Pim, Dr. Henry T. Hodgkin.

As a supplement to the Missionary Number of the Friend appears a sheet giving some account of the work and financial condition of the La Rochelle Mission of Friends in France. It was established three years ago on the west coast of France, by Charles D. and Mabel Terrell. These Friends have established a temperance café in the midst of drinking places, just opposite the harbor. In the suburb of St. Eloi there is a First-day school, "workers' meeting," and a weekly reunion. At the nearby port of La Pallise, where there is no place of worship, a First-day school has been started, and a mission meeting is held every First-day evening. A Friends' meeting is held in La Rochelle every First-day afternoon, in which, though hymns are sung and there is reading as well as prayer and addresses, yet "the freedom of the ministry, the periods of silent waiting upon God, short though they be, and much of the teaching itself, including our views on war and the sacraments, are surely distinctively educative in our ways of belief."

The Swarthmore Phoenix for Tenth month notes that of recent graduates Elizabeth Sutton, 1903, is teaching in the Kennett Square Friends' School; Helen Lease, 1903, teaches in the Friends' School, Salem, N. J., while Margaret Taylor, 1902, has charge of the German classes in Friends' Central School, Philadelphia. William Hannum is working in Denver, Horace Ervien in Altoona, Ohio. Norman Passmore, who is at work in Philadelphia, is boarding in Swarthmore, and occasionally visits the College. George Satterthwaite is working "out West." Walker Bond was married on Ninth month 30th, to a young lady of Ohio.

In order to add to the fund for the use of the Friends' Conference to be held at Toronto, Rebecca B. Nicholson offers to personally conduct an excursion to the World's Fair at St. Louis, all the profits of which will be turned over to that fund. The trip will be made about the middle of Sixth month, and will consume twelve days or more. Persons wishing further information will address, enclosing stamp, Rebecca B. Nicholson, Box 444, Trenton, N. J.

The papers read at the Centennial Exercises of Miami Meeting of Friends at Waynesville, O., an account of which we gave last week, were directed to be printed in pamphlet form and copies may be had, at about 25 cents apiece by applying to Seth H. Ellis, Waynesville, O.

MEETINGS IN CONNECTION WITH BALTIMORE YEARLY MEETING.

YOUNG FRIENDS' ASSOCIATION.

ON Seventh-day evening, Tenth month 24th, a meeting of the Young Friends' Association was addressed by Henry W. Wilbur, of New York, his subject being "Advancement of Friends' Principles." He said that if the principles on which the Society of Friends rests are simply left lying around loose for anybody to pick up who chooses, they will be received by very few. It is the business of our members to become propagandists, and every Friends' meeting-house should be a light for the whole neighborhood. He said that whoever has a helpful thought and the ability to express it, has a gift in the ministry, and that inspired hearers make inspired speakers. The indwelling of the Divine Spirit which is in every human heart will more and more make itself manifest if time is taken for spiritual development.

EDUCATIONAL MEETING.

An educational meeting was held on Second-day evening, Edward C. Wilson, now Principal of the Baltimore Friends'

School, made the first address. He urged the importance of taking care of the body, and expressed his surprise that so few parents ask questions concerning the sanitary conditions of schools. He thought a good school should produce a diversity of results based on a diversity of gifts, and should aim to give power rather than knowledge.

President Swain, of Swarthmore College, said the chief element of a successful life is the cultivation of the powers to be used in a life of service. He spoke of the recognition given to the value of education by the Mosely Commission, which is now studying the schools of America for the benefit of England, and said that one of the best proofs of the value of college education is the fact that no college graduate who has lived his after years well, regrets the time that he spent in college.

TEMPERANCE MEETING.

On Third-day evening a meeting under the care of the Philanthropic Committee was addressed by Edwin C. Dinwiddie, of Washington, who told of the effective work done by the Anti-Saloon League and its influence in securing temperance legislation. Edward Nicholson and Jonathan K. Taylor also spoke briefly.

EQUAL RIGHTS.

A meeting of the Equal Rights Association of Baltimore Yearly Meeting was held on Fourth-day at 2 p.m. Anna W. Janney was appointed a delegate to the National Suffrage Association to be held in Washington. Mary Bentley Thomas gave a report of the last National Association at New Orleans. Susan W. Lippincott made an earnest appeal for a heartier support of the movement. Anna W. Janney regretted the indifference of young women, who do not seem to realize that they owe the educational opportunities open to them at the present time to the heroic efforts of Lucy Stone, Susan B. Anthony, and their devoted co-workers.

ADVERTISEMENTS IN MAGAZINES.

A SUB-COMMITTEE of the Committee on Philanthropic Labor of Baltimore Yearly Meeting of Friends made the following report concerning the character of the advertisements that appear in some of our popular magazines, with special reference to the advertisements of intoxicating liquors.

"Thirty-four publications were examined. Of these, thirteen contained no advertisements to which any exception could be taken. They are Country Life in America, Youths' Companion, Book News, The Chautauquan, The Bookman, St. Nicholas, The Century, The Critic, The Outlook, Ladies' Home Journal, Saturday Evening Post, The Independent, and The Country Gentleman. To all of these letters were written stating the purpose of the investigation and replies were received from all of them except Book News, stating that it is their fixed policy to exclude all advertisements of intoxicating liquors or other articles and schemes of doubtful propriety.

"Six other magazines contain no advertisements of intoxicating liquors and four of them write that it is their fixed policy to exclude all such. These four, The American Monthly Review of Reviews, The American Agriculturist, The Cosmopolitan, and McClure's, contain advertisements of tonics which have a considerable percentage of alcohol. The American Agriculturist contains also a considerable number of medical advertisements. The others are, Everybody's Magazine and Harper's Bazar; these also contain advertisements of tonics, and The Cosmopolitan has a great number of medical advertisements.

"The following fifteen periodicals contain liquor and, some of them, other objectionable advertisements:

The liquor advertisements refer to beer, whiskey or champagne. The World's Work, Current Literature, Life, Leslie's Weekly, Harper's Weekly, Harper's Monthly, North American Review, The National Magazine, New England Magazine, Outing, Munsey, Scribner's, Leslie's Popular Monthly, Lippincott's, and The Atlantic Monthly. All of these magazines have many admirable features and they go into many homes."

To those publications mentioned that contain objectionable advertisements the following letter was directed to be sent in the name of the Yearly Meeting: "The Religious Society of Friends has always felt a deep concern for the sobriety, purity and honesty of our people, and desires earnestly that these principles may be extended. We realize the wide-spread influence exerted by the [name of Journal] with its many admirable qualities, and it is with regret that we find advertisements of intoxicating liquors, proprietary medicines and doubtful financial enterprises published in your pages. Perused as they are by the members of many families, old persons and young, it is evident that many may thereby be led into errors which they will regret, and which will produce great suffering and loss.

"We are informed by a number of publishers of popular magazines that it is their settled policy to reject such advertisements, and it is our hope, in thus appealing to you, that yours may be added to the list of journals whose managers are careful that such great influence may always be exerted on the side of righteousness. We would highly appreciate such action on your part and would be grateful for a reply.

"Signed on behalf of Baltimore Yearly Meeting of Friends, Clerk."

The committee recommended that Friends individually encourage magazines to keep their advertising pages clean. After the report was read several Friends testified that there are no objectionable advertisements in the Farm Journal or Rural New Yorker. The suggestion was also made that subscribers to magazines send letters to the editors concerning the advertising pages, either of commendation or criticism, according to their deserts.

THE PEACE SOCIETY AND THE ANGLO-FRENCH TREATY.

THE Executive of the Peace Society of England have adopted the following Resolution, which has been forwarded to the Premier, the Right Hon. A. J. Balfour, M. P., viz.:

"The Committee of the Peace Society respectfully congratulate His Majesty's Government on the conclusion of the Treaty between England and France which has just been announced;

"They rejoice in this action, because by expressly confirming the engagements entered into in The Hague Convention of 1899, the Treaty helps to secure the future activity and usefulness of the Court of International Arbitration established at The Hague;

"They also rejoice because it is a further step in the direction in which the Peace Society has been working for nearly a century; and because they believe that it is by such agreements, providing for the settlement of possible differences, and promoting mutual confidence and coöperation, rather than by measures and acts of retaliation and reprisal, that the permanent peace and prosperity of nations are secured."

THE LAKE MOHONK INDIAN CONFERENCE.

THE twenty-first annual Lake Mohonk Conference of Friends of the Indian which assembled at Mohonk Lake, N. Y., Tenth month 21-23d, was a gathering of unusual interest. It had an admirable president in the person of Hon. John D. Long, Secretary of the Navy under President McKinley. Among the 150 members present were five members of the Board of Indian Commissioners, Hon. Philip C. Garrett, Hon. Darwin R. James, Hon. Merrill E. Gates, Archbishop P. J. Ryan and Hon. Albert K. Smiley; more than a dozen well-known educators, including Presidents Eaton, of Beloit College; Taylor, of Vassar; Scott, of Rutgers; Thomas, of Bryn Mawr, and Meserve of Shaw University; about twenty editors, including Dr. Lyman Abbott, of the Outlook; Walter Allen, of the Boston Herald, and Rev. Drs. J. N. Hallock, T. O. Conant and J. B. Drury, of New York, and A. E. Dunning, of Boston; ten missionaries and active workers among the Indians, including Dr. Sheldon Jackson, of Alaska; and such other well-known men as Hon. John J. Fitzgerald, of Brooklyn, a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs in the House of Representatives; General C. H. Howard, of Chicago; Major-General James H. Wilson, of Wilmington; Hon. Charles Andrews, of Syracuse, N. Y.; Rev. Dr. Francis E. Clark, of Boston, and Dr. Lucien C. Warner, of Irvington, N. Y.

A resume of the Indian work during the past fiscal year showed a decrease in expenditures of $650,000, without impairing the quality of the work in any quarter. An especially hopeful gain was made in reducing the number of politically-appointed Indian agents, twenty-one of whom have been replaced during the year by school superintendents under the civil service, and seven having been appointed superintendents, making twenty-eight political appointees discontinued in a single year.

Among the special subjects discussed at the Conference were the evils of the agency system and the best means of hastening its abolition, the need of more religious training in Indian schools, educational needs in Indian Territory, and conditions in Hawaii, Porto Rico and Alaska. The recent alleged scandal involving certain officials in Indian Territory was not discussed, it being deemed not expedient to anticipate the results of the inquiry now in progress.

Deplorable conditions in Indian Territory with respect to the education of the resident whites were portrayed by Edgar B. Henderson, of the Indian Bureau at Washington, and verified by Benjamin S. Coppock and Alice Robertson, both supervisors of Indian education in the Territory. The Indians, who as the Five Civilized Tribes, maintain the highest Indian civilization in the country, number about 80,000 and have excellent schools; the whites outnumber the Indians nearly eight to one, but with a very few exceptions in or near incorporated towns, this entire white population is absolutely without educational facilities of any kind. The Indian Department makes provision for Indian education only; and this white population is growing up in a state of ignorance that menaces the morals of the Indians and the spread of civilized customs. The situation is grave and demands some solution. Another problem discussed by E. B. Henderson is that of maintaining schools and civil institutions among Indians not taxed. On Third month 4th, 1906, tribal schools among many tribes will be abolished, and the schools and forms of self government that must eventually succeed them will have not sufficient means of support, personal taxes being wholly inadequate, and the Indians' lands under the law, not subject to taxation for twenty-five years after allotment. It would, therefore, seem that before the above date some provision should be made for taxing the lands of the educated Indians and the "squaw men," who are perfectly competent to bear the burden of taxation.

Dr. Sheldon Jackson gave a vivid and lamentable picture of conditions in Alaska, where the native tribes, since the advent of the mining settlement with its saloons and adventurers, are rapidly dying out. Unfitted by their simple manner of living to resist the effects of intoxicants or to combat epidemics even of the most simple nature, they are decreasing in number so rapidly that it is thought by many that the only hope lies in placing them on reservations to protect them from the whites. Dr. Jackson does not favor this idea, but fears that unless something is done, in five years little more than a remnant of these natives will be left.

The needs of the Pima Indians in Arizona were brought to the attention of the Conference by Rev. Dr. George L. Spining, of New Jersey. A few years ago these Indians, then a successful, self-supporting, agricultural tribe, were deprived of irrigation privilege through the diverting of the waters of the Gila and Salt Rivers by whites. Since that time, unable to raise crops, they are gradually being reduced to starvation and have required help for existence. Worse even than the condition of requiring financial aid, their privations are bringing about the downfall of the state of civilization which they had built up. The Secretary of the Interior has given personal attention to the matter with the result, it is hoped, that relief will be given by constructing a large storage dam. The Conference adopted a resolution commending this action on the part of the Secretary.

In another resolution the Conference reaffirmed its action of last year urging upon Congress the need of legislation providing for the allotment of the lands of the New York Indians.

A suggestion offered by Dr. Lyman Abbott that the Conference take up the question of transferring the functions of the Indian Bureau to the War Department led to much discussion. The idea was strongly opposed on the ground that excellent progress is now being made under the existing system. No action on this point was taken.

At its last session the conclusions of the Conference and the results of the discussion were adopted in the following platform:

"The Indian problem is approaching its solution, leaving us confronting the larger problem of our duties toward the people who have recently become subject to our government and dependent on our care. In dealing with the Indians the objects to be accomplished are no longer questioned: They are the abandonment of the reservation system; the discontinuance of Indian Agencies; such education of all Indian children as will fit them for self-support and self-government; access to the courts for protection of their rights; amenability to the law in punishment for their crimes; the same liberty that white men enjoy to own, buy, sell, travel, pay taxes, and enjoy in good government the benefits enjoyed by other taxed citizens; and by these means a speedy incorporation of all Indians, with all the rights of citizenship, into the American commonwealth.

"The best methods to secure these results are not wholly clear but, the experience of the past points to the following conclusions: The agency should be discontinued in all cases where the land is ready for settlement, and the Indians, when necessary, should be temporarily placed under the care of a bonded superintendent with limited powers, and the policy of the Indian Bureau in this direction is strongly commended. Wherever practicable, the education of Indian children should be provided for in the schools of the States and Territories, if necessary for untaxed Indians at Federal expense or out of Indian funds; wherever this is not practicable, provision should be made by the Federal government in Indian schools. The Indian should be encouraged in industrial arts, both in the preservation of his own and the acquisition of ours; the end should always be their industrial and moral development. The work of the government whether national, State or Territorial, in providing for secular education does not lessen the responsibility of the churches for the religious education of the Indian. We regard with interest and hope the recent action of the Secretary of the Interior opening the way for religious work of the churches in connection with government schools and we urge the churches to co-operate with each other and with the government in this work.

"The same principle should govern us in all our dealings with other dependent people: their civil rights should be scrupulously safe-guarded; liberal provision should be made by Congress for their development and civilization; their industries should be encouraged; and their education should be so provided for that, whatever may be their final political relations to the United States, they may be equipped, at the earliest possible day, for self-support and self-government."

EDUCATIONAL.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE.

"ONE of those lectures which stand out prominently in the life of a tecture-goer,"—such might be the description of Prof. Kuersteiner's lecture on Fifth-day morning, Tenth month 29th. He spoke on the subject "The Prince of Spanish Letters." Taking us briefly through the wonderful maze of thrilling escapes in Algiers he brought us to the silent, peaceful, literary life of Cervantes, author of Don Quixote. In his estimation Don Quixote is the greatest of novels. When we consider that it was written 300 years ago and in a time when all Spain was flooded with trashy literature about the knight and the lady, and unrequited love, we must realize what a power Cervantes, the "Prince of Spanish Letters," has been in the literary world. Don Quixote not only in humor but likewise in strong description is a great book. In consequence of this lecture a new interest in Spanish literature has been aroused among the students.

Fourth-day, 28th, President Swain gave a reception to Professor Kuersteiner, the faculty and a few friends attending.

On Sixth-day, 30th, Professor Kuersteiner spoke before Professor Bronk's French class on the subject of Balzac. Though many great men have spoken on Balzac and though the story of his life and writings are well-known, still the light in which Professor Kuersteiner presented them made them even more interesting. He read from Balzac's correspondence, where he speaks of overcoming, "That rascal myself." Altogether this lecture was perhaps better than that on Cervantes; the speaker seemed to go deeper into the subject.

On Third-day, 28th, the Friends' Central School Club held its regular meeting. It is very pleasing to see that a new enthusiasm is manifest.

On Second-day, 26th, Eunomian held a postponed regular meeting. The literary exercises consisted of a paper on the "Philippine Currency," by William Diebold and a Mark Twain reading by Maurice T. Hansell. Several new members were elected. It was a very successful meeting.

On the same day President Swain spoke in Baltimore on the subject of "Higher Education."

Dr. Appleton opened his course of Shakespeare readings with "Love's Labor's Lost" on the 23d ult. He will read a play each fortnight.

Professor Hayes read his paper on "Preparation for Service" before the Young Friends' Association of West Chester on the 28th. The suggestions of the speaker brought out an important discussion as to the needs of special activities in our Society.

First-day, 31st, Dr. Alleman read a paper on "College Integrity." In the meeting Samuel Vest spoke.

Summing up the details of the great accident at Indianapolis President Swain announced that he would like the presidents of all classes to meet Dean Bond in order to draw up a suitable expression of sympathy. The following was sent:

"The close fellowship of college with college makes it inevitable that disaster falling upon one college should be felt by all. Swarthmore, though her President, feels a personal relation with Purdue and would express to the sister college, deepest sympathy, in this hour of sorrow, for the unutterable loss that has come upon her.

"In the workings of Infinite Wisdom may this overwhelming calamity be made to serve toward highest ends! And for all who mourn their dead may there be found infinite consolation.

"In behalf of the Faculty and students.

"ELIZABETH POWELL BOND, Dean.

"H. W. Mowery, '04; F. N. Price, '05; F. D. Clifford, '06; W. McDonough, '07."

GEORGE SCHOOL.

At the Centennial Anniversary of the establishment of Miami Monthly Meeting of Friends at Waynesville, Ohio, held Tenth month 16th and 17th, Dr. Joseph S. Walton gave an address.

Sixth-day, Tenth month 23d, the General Committee visited the school. The attendance was unusually large; a great deal of interest was manifested, and much satisfaction was expressed, especially with the many improvements made during the summer.

Tenth month 24th the Penn Literary Society held a regular meeting. The following program was given: recitation, "The Hanging of a Picture," Anna Parry; oration, "A Day with Napoleon," Aubrey Crewitt; reading, "The Movement Cure for Rheumatism," Thomas Atkinson; "Cleanings of the Penn," Arthur Bye; essay, "The Value of Athletics," Charles Sheppard; recitation, "Mr. Brown has a Haircut," Naomi Williams; play, a scene from "David Harum," Alice Miller and James Green.

Second-day evening, Tenth month 26th, Dr. Owen L. Shinn, of the University of Pennsylvania, gave an interesting lecture before the Science Club on the subject of "Fuel."

On Seventh-day evening, Tenth month 31st, a general reception was held in the parlors and dining-room, where all enjoyed progressive games, bingo, etc.

Drayton Hall is now nearly completed, and it is hoped that all of the boys who have been rooming elsewhere temporarily since the opening of school, will be able to occupy their new quarters before Eleventh month 6th.

Twenty-three different species of oak trees, all the known species native to Bucks county, have been planted on the southwest campus along the drive leading to the farmhouse. These trees were presented to the school by the George School Committee.

Our success in debating, oratory, literary work, etc., depends very largely upon the facilities afforded by our library. As yet, we have no complete sets of periodicals, and our work is continually handicapped on this account. If any friends of the school have old volumes of standard periodicals, especially those published before 1894, for which they have no further use, it will be greatly appreciated if they will donate them to the library and express them to the school at its expense.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

PHILANTHROPIC COMMITTEE OF PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

THE meeting of the Philanthropic Committee on the afternoon of Tenth month 31st, was of more than usual interest. The sub-committee on Improper Publications was encouraged to undertake the work of examining the advertisements in magazines and newspapers and writing letters to the editors regarding them. The sub-committee on Peace and Arbitration presented a concern that a memorial be sent to Congress against enlarging the navy; this committee was directed to prepare such a memorial to be submitted to the next Yearly Meeting.

A full and interesting report of the Flower Mission Work was read, telling of the eagerness of the children at the Neighborhood Guild to receive the flowers, of the sunshine that they had brought into many a sick-room, and of the joy they had given to the inmates of the various hospitals to which they were sent. The young people in the country had entered heartily into the work of giving the dwellers in the dark places of the cities these glimpses of God's out-of-doors. Besides cut-flowers, potted plants, fruit, jellies, and money had been contributed. Any one desiring this interesting report in full for a First-day school or Friends' Association will be furnished with a copy on sending a two-cent stamp to Alice Fussell, Media, Pa.

Susan P. Wharton told of the helpful work done at the Starr Centre, 700 Lombard St., especially among the colored people. She described the selling of coal at just a little above cost, by the bucket or quarter-ton; the penny lunches sold to school children for the actual cost of the food (the time and brains of the workers not being counted), the sale of Pasteurized milk, by which dozens of babies have been kept alive; and the system of weekly visiting by means of which families were gradually lifted up to a higher plane of living.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.—The fall meeting of the First-day School Organization of Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting was held Fourth-day evening, Tenth month 28th, 1903, at the meeting-house, Fifteenth and Race streets. Reports from the standing committees were read. The program for the evening consisted of talks on "The New Educational Plan," by Mary H. Whitson, and "Can the New Plan be Adapted to the Small First-day Schools," by Russell H. Smith. The plan was fully explained and an earnest discussion followed.
H. E. S., Sec.

PLYMOUTH, PA.—The regular meeting of the Friends' Association was held Tenth month 30th. Carrie Buckman opened the exercises by a reading entitled, "Every-day Heroism," followed by Eva Gillam reciting "Tubal Cain." Annie F. Ambler read "The Society of Friends and the Bible," from the FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER. An interesting discussion was participated in by Benjamin Smith, Alvin Haines, and others. Howard Webster gave a recitation. Anne Davis read a selection entitled, "An Acquaintance with Grief." We then adjourned to meet Eleventh month 27th, 1903.
W. W. A., Sec.

HORSHAM, PA.—The Friends' Association met at Horsham Meeting-house on First-day, Tenth month 25th, at 2.30 p.m. After a short silence Elizabeth R. Wood gave a Bible reading, which was followed by reading of the minutes by Secretary Emma C. Comly.

Tacy L. Paxson read a portion of the Discipline on "Meeting for Worship," Lottie Twining gave a selected reading, entitled, "Not Changed, but Glorified." Willie Paxson recited "Two Boys."

The committee on current topics, William J. Hollowell and J. Walter Green, made an interesting report. W. J. Hollowell said that while he is glad to see the association well attended, he does not wish to see it take the place of the meeting. J. Walter Green read an article on "The New Christianity."

Ely J. Smith next gave a very interesting paper on the influence of the early Friends in the affairs of the Commonwealth. In the discussion which followed it was regretted that Friends no longer come forward as in former days to take an active part in the political questions of the hour, although the discipline cautions members against accepting any office in civil government, the duties of which are inconsistent with their religious principles.

A communication was read from the general association requesting Horsham to send five delegates to the meeting to be held at Wilmington, Delaware, Eleventh month 14th, at 10.30 a. m. Howard Comly, Comly Walton, Arthur Jarrett, Jane K. Jarrett, and William Satterthwaite, Jr., were named to attend and report at the next meeting of the association, Eleventh month 29th.—[Doylestown Intelligencer.]

NEW YORK.—A regular meeting of Young Friends' Association of New York and Brooklyn was held Tenth month 25th in Rutherford Place, N. Y.

The publication committee recommended the printing of 5,000 copies of the booklet entitled "Christianity as Friends see it," and the Association adopted the recommendation and approved means for providing the money needed for this purpose.

A circular letter was received from the Executive Committee of the General Conference of Friends' Associations announcing the Autumn Meeting of the General Conference at Wilmington, Del., Eleventh month 14th, and requesting the appointment of at least five delegates from each Association, and extending a general invitation to all interested Friends. The appointment of delegates from this Association was deferred until our next meeting, in order to better ascertain which members could conveniently attend.

The report on "Current Topics" touched upon the advent of John Alexander Dowie and his followers in this city, and the suspicion was expressed that they were living upon a much higher plane morally, than the daily papers were inclined to set forth. The impending political contest in this city was also commented upon. In the "Literature" report several magazine articles were brought to the attention of the members as showing some evils of the times; that is, the prevailing and alarming avarice and corruption in financial, political and labor union circles.

In place of the regular paper some selections were read from the address given at the Conference held at Asbury Park in 1902. A very general discussion followed the reading, and then adjournment was taken to the next meeting to be held in Brooklyn, Eleventh month 8th.

WALTER HAVILAND, Sec.

CORNWALL, N. Y.—The Friends' Association met at the home of Charles C. Cocks, Eleventh month 1st, 1903. The members of the Association were fortunate in having with them Joseph T. McDowell and William M. Jackson, of New York, who added greatly to the interest of the meeting. The program consisted of the following readings: "Bear Ye One Another's Burdens," by Charles C. Cocks; "Things That Make for Peace," from Elizabeth Powell Bond's "Words by the Way," by William B. Cocks, and "Overcome Evil with Good," by Rowland Cocks. These selections were discussed by William M. Jackson, Joseph T. McDowell, Elizabeth K. Seaman and others.
A. M. B., Cor. Sec.

Adams; Executive Committee, Cornelia A. Gavett, Clara S. Kushmore, Mercy R. Vail. There was no regular program for the evening, and plans were discussed for the year. The meetings are held at 3 p. m. on the last First-day of each month.

LITERARY NOTES.

There is an Emersonian serenity and sanity about Bliss Carman's first book of prose meditations with its alluring title "The Kinship of Nature" (Boston: L. C. Page & Co.) The author is an enemy of commonplace and tedious conventionality, and he has given us a heartening and tonic book, dedicated to an early teacher with beautiful affection, and yielding many poetic passages and unhackneyed views of life. Here is a taste of his buoyant altruism: "It is a poor lesson we have learned from this great Nature, if we have not taken the hint of generosity, if we have not learned tolerance, if we have not been infected with a lofty and unflinching sweetness, which is full of care for other's joys as well as our own."

It is not every author who can produce memorable aphorisms like those scattered through these pages, as—

"One measure of a man is his capacity for enduring solitude."

"Radiant, happy sense of success comes only to the loving heart."

"It is good to remember and to take courage."

The recent lyrics by the same author, "From the Green Book of the Bards" (Page & Co.), reveal the same kindly optimism and keen affection for the outdoor world as do his essays, with the added note of poignant sweetness to which prose cannot attain. The dedication to a lost comrade touches a great truth with pensive beauty,—

"For upon this lovely earth mortal sorrow still must bide,
And remembrance still must lurk like a pang in beauty's side,

Ah, one wistful heartache now April with her joy must bring,

And the want of you return always with returning spring!"

"Miss Baily heard their lessons, sitting at a table covered with a red cloth, which had a white Grecian fret for a border and smelled of crumbs. On the wall behind her was a faded print of 'Belshazzar's Feast'; in those days this was probably the only feasting the room ever saw. . . Both rooms looked out on the garden,—the garden and, in fine weather, Mr. David Baily! Ah, me—what it was, in the dreary stretches of mental arithmetic, to look across the flower-beds and see Mr. David—tall and dark and melancholy—pacing up and down, sometimes with a rake, oftener with empty hands; always with vague, beautiful eyes fixed on some inner vision of heart-broken memory."

The flavor of this passage from Margaret Deland's new volume of stories, "Dr. Lavendar's People" (New York: Harper Bros.), will recall to readers of "Old Chester Tales" the charm of mingled humor and pathos which the author threw about that new-world Cranford. As one reads these pages, now tear-stained, now bright with keen wit, there come back to him memories of the shadows and sun-flecked spaces of Margaret Deland's "Old Garden." In that lovely poem were hints of just such tender sympathy and gladness as one would expect from her when she should pass from that peaceful garth to meet and portray the villagers out in the street. These recent prose stories and the earlier poem come from one who is of the sisterhood of Jane Austen and Mrs. Gaskell.

Chas. G. D. Roberts with each new book adds to our impression that his is a rare and wholesome message to his generation. In his latest poems, "The Book of the Rose" (Page & Co.), there is a goodly draught of idealism. "The Aim," a poem after the teaching of Browning, but with its author's own fresh lyricism, makes this fine avowal,—

"Let this be something in Thy sight:
I have not, in the slothful dark,
Forgot the Vision and the Height.

Neither my body nor my soul
To earth's low ease will yield consent.
I praise Thee for my will to strive,
I bless Thy goad of discontent."

Ray Stannard Baker recently startled the country with an exposé of the combination formed against the public by capital and labor in Chicago. In McClure's Magazine for this month he describes another startling labor situation—the one in New York. He blames Parks and his followers, but places the greatest blame on the trusts, the big corporations that do the bribing. The article contains food for thoughtful readers.

An article on "How We Bought the Great West," by the late Noah Brooks, in Scribner's Magazine, tells how we acquired the vast region included in the Louisiana Purchase, and of the interesting contemporary political reasons that influenced President Jefferson in undertaking so great a responsibility without any support or apparent means of meeting the great obligation involved.

CONSECRATION.

Tho' the rain may fall, and the wind be blowing,

And cold and chill is the wintry blast,

Tho' the cloudy sky is still clouidier growing,

And the dead leaves tell the summer is past;

My face I hold to the stormy heaven,

My heart is as calm as the summer sea;

Glad to receive what my God has given,
Whate'er it be.

When I feel the cold, I can say, "He sends it;"

And his wind blows blessings, I surely know;

For I've never a want, but He attends it,

And my heart beats warm, tho' the wind may blow.

The soft, sweet summer was warm and glowing;

Brought were the blossoms on every bough;

I trusted Him when the roses were blowing.

I trust Him now.

Small were my faith should it weakly falter,

Now that the roses have ceased to blow;

Frail were the trust that now should alter,

Doubting His love when the storm clouds grow.

If I trust Him once, I must trust Him ever;

And His way is best, tho' I stand or fall;

Through wind and storm He will leave me never.

He sends it all.

Why should my heart be faint and fearing?

Mighty He rules above the storm;

Even the wintry blast is keeping me warm.

Showing His power to cheer me warm.

Never a care on my heart is pressing;

Never a care can disturb my breast;

Everything that He sends is blessing,

—Rebecca N. Taylor, in Friends' Review, 1882.

GROWTH.

My body grows as grow the lilies fair,

By food and drink, in sunshine and fresh air,

Without my thought or care.

My soul, grow thou into a form more fair,

God's self thy water, bread, thy sun and air,

THE LIGHT OF LOVE.

UNTO all the Father giveth
Evidence of perfect love,
Grace and strength are freely flowing
From the ceaseless Fount above.
Grace to love and be made loving,
Strength to do His holy will ;
In a loving, humble service
Solace lies for every ill.

And no matter what our station,
Whether we are high or low,
If we seek to do His bidding
We shall then His presence know.
" Seek and you shall find " is promised,
" Knock and it shall opened be ; "
Every soul may find a service,
And from bondage may be free.

Dwell not then on thy unfitness,
He will take thee as thou art ;
Cleanse and purify thy spirit,
Renovate thy contrite heart.
Then within thy broken spirit Evil thoughts can ne'er abide
And the Saviour's tender mercy
Will past sin and sorrow hide.

Never has His precious promise
To the earnest seeker failed,
Then why doubt his earnest pleading ?
Let the spirit be unveiled.
Let His voice above all others
Reign supreme o'er every part.
Listen—He is speaking to thee—
Trust in Him with all thy heart.

And the sunshine of His spirit
Which in bounty He has given,
Then will fill thy soul with gladness
Bringing in the peace of Heaven.
" Follow me " that voice is calling
Look not to what others do,
If they " tarry till My coming " '
Thou must to thyself be true.

Like the shepherd's flocks that know him,
Hear and answer to his call,
In His shelter He will shield us
Lift us up whene'er we fall.
Then, oh then, we'll still press onward
Trusting ever in our Guide ;
And in silent adoration
In His love we'll still abide.

ALICE P. SELLERS.

Philadelphia, Tenth month, 1903.

An Apt Illustration.

A GRAND TRUNK railway conductor, who is a faithful member of a Sunday morning class in the west end of this city, gave this apt illustration recently in bearing testimony to the benefit of the class-meeting in his own case. Coming in off the railway train to such a gathering, and finding so much warmth and sympathy and spiritual enjoyment there, reminded him of one of their locomotives in winter-time, which would come to the end of its journey covered with snow, and its motion clogged with slush and ice. Being useless in that condition for further work, it is run into the round-house, where it is at once surrounded with steam-pipes and a high temperature, which soon have the effect of melting the snow, and clearing the machinery, the ice dropping off in chunks. The engine is then fit to resume its position at the head of a train.

CURRENT EVENTS.

PROFESSOR THEODORE MOMMSEN, who has been for more than fifty years one of the leading lights of the University of Berlin, died Eleventh month 1st, of apoplexy. His contributions to the science of law, to history, and to general literature were as valuable in quality as they were great in quantity. His " History of Rome," which gave him a world-wide reputation, was written half a century ago. His work on Latin inscriptions is a monument to his painstaking industry and careful research. The Emperor called him one of the glories of Germany. In politics MommSEN was a Radical-Liberal, and he was active recently in an effort to unite the Radical-Liberals with the Socialists to form a strong Liberal party to confront the Conservatives.

BARON D'ESTOURNELLES DE CONSTANT, addressing the arbitration committee of the Chamber of Deputies, on the 28th, said the Anglo-French treaty was only the first step. Denmark was now seeking arbitration and France would probably accede to her wishes. Treaties would soon be signed between Denmark and Norway and Sweden. As to Great Britain he said, " Her most responsible officials have made categorical declarations to me that the arbitration convention was only one of three ends desired, the second being a general liquidation of all outstanding difficulties, and the third an agreement providing for the limitation of naval expenses." He gave to the United States the credit for initiating the movement, saying it was largely the outgrowth of the Presidents' insistent support of The Hague tribunal.

ONE result of the visit of the Russian Foreign Minister, Count Lamsdorff, to France will be the strengthening of the bonds between the two nations. There is a general impression that the real object of the visit was to discuss affairs in the East, but the Czar's letter to President Loubet says that one of its chief purposes was to express the gratification of the Czar at the recent course of France in extending the cause of international peace by establishing more friendly relations with both France and Italy.

ON the 27th of Tenth month Geneva and the Calvinistic churches of Switzerland and France did penance before the world for the burning at the stake of Michael Servetus 350 years ago. A granite block was set up at Champel, Switzerland, bearing the following two inscriptions :

" On October the 27th, 1553, died at the stake at Champel, Michael Servetus, of Villaneuva d'Aragon. Born September 29th, 1511."

" Reverent and grateful sons of Calvin, our great reformer, but condemning an error which was that of his age, and steadfastly adhering to liberty of conscience according to the true principles of the Reformation and of the Gospel, we have erected this expiatory monument on the 27th of October, 1903."

EMMA BOOTH-TUCKER, who has been at the head of the Salvation Army in America since 1896, was killed last week in a train wreck 85 miles east of Kansas City. She was a woman of great ability as an organizer, her enthusiasm being tempered with clear judgment. She had the rare quality of perfect sympathy and was equally at home in the parlors of the rich and the squalid rooms of the poor. As a preacher before great crowds she was singularly winning. Her death is a great loss not only to the Salvation Army but to the cause of religion and philanthropy.

THE fifth annual conference of the Catholic Colleges in the United States was held last week in the Catholic High School auditorium in Philadelphia. The members of the conference represent the leading Catholic colleges in all parts of the United States and the parish schools of twenty-two dioceses. Among the topics discussed was " The Organization of the Parish School System," by the Superintendent of Parish Schools in the diocese of Columbus, O., who said that in the public schools the weak point is that there is too much system. Other papers were on the value of the study of Mathematics as a moral as well as an intellectual discipline, on "Moral Training without Religion," "College Athletics." One reason given why Catholics attend non-Catholic colleges was the desire of parents to have their sons associate with young men of a higher social scale.

The result of the elections, as far as it can be known as we go to press on Fourth-day morning, in those places that have been watched with most general interest is: In New York City the overwhelming defeat of Mayor Low, the non-partisan, good-government candidate by the Tammany "Democratic" candidate George B. McClellan; in Rhode Island the result uncertain as yet, but indications pointing toward the re-election of Governor Garvin, the Democratic candidate who stands for good government in that politically corrupt little State; in Ohio the overwhelming defeat of Mayor Tom L. Johnson, the Democratic candidate for Governor, and the election of a legislature that will return Senator Hanna to Washington.

JOHN WESLEY'S SILVER PLATE.

The effects of John Wesley's high thinking are still evident, but his plain living is more likely to be lost sight of. He gave liberally to the needy, and often denied himself that he might assist some poor invalid.

In 1776 the Government issued the following circular to John Wesley :

"Reverend Sir:—As the Commissioners cannot doubt that you have plate for which you have hitherto neglected to make an entry, they have directed me to send you a copy of the Lords' Order, and to inform you that they expect that you will forthwith mark the entry of all your plate, such entry to bear date from the commencement of the plate duty, or from such time as you have served, used, had, or kept any quantity of silver plate chargeable by the Act of Parliament, as in default thereof the Board will be obliged to signify your refusal to their lordships.

"N. B.—An immediate answer is desired."

"Sir.—I have two silver spoons at London, and two at Bristol; this is all the plate which I have at present, and I shall not buy any more while so many around me want bread.

"I am, sir, your most humble servant,
"JOHN WESLEY."

XLVI.

The true belief stands in the light that condemns all evil.

GEORGE FOX.

From his Journal.

MY PRAYER.

GREAT GOD, I ask Thee for no meaner pelf
Than that I may not disappoint myself ;
That in my action I may soar as high
As I can now discern with this clear eye.

And next in value, which Thy kindness lends,
That I may greatly disappoint my friends,
Howe'er they think or hope that it may be,
They may not dream how Thou'st distinguished me.

That my weak hand may equal my firm faith,
And my life practise more than my tongue saith ;
That my low conduct may not show,
Nor my relenting lines,
That I Thy purpose did not know,
Or overrated Thy designs.

—Henry D. Thoreau.

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION OF PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

THE "Association for the Promotion of First-day Schools within the Limits of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting," dates back in its beginnings to the time when First-day schools were a radical innovation in our Society, and when the names of organizations were not so short as they are now and were made to indicate with great accuracy just what was intended to be done. Unlike those of the other yearly meetings, the Philadelphia Association does not hold its principal meeting of the year at the time of yearly meeting, though one or more public meetings are held under its care at that time. A characteristic of this Association also is that it has not set as its definite task merely to hold an annual First-day school reunion (though it does that, too, at the time of yearly meeting in Fifth month), nor merely in a general way to discuss things more or less nearly or remotely connected with First-day school interests. It has aimed to do what its cumbersome but explicit name indicates—to promote First-day schools within its limits.

The annual meeting of this Association was held in the meeting-house at 15th and Race streets, Philadelphia, on Seventh-day, Eleventh month 7th. The morning session began at 10 o'clock with John L. Carver as clerk. The assistant clerk being absent, Mary McAllister was appointed to serve for the session. Reports were received and read from the constituent Quarterly Meeting Unions. These are: Concord in Delaware and Chester counties, Pa., and northern Delaware; Haddonfield in central New Jersey; Abington in the northern part of Philadelphia county, Montgomery county, and Bucks; Philadelphia, embracing the central meetings of the city; Western, in Chester and Lancaster counties; Burlington, in central New Jersey; Bucks, in Bucks county, Pa. and in the western part of New Jersey; Salem in southern New Jersey.

These reports gave an account of the number and condition of the schools within the limits of the respective unions. For the most part they were encouraging, but where ground had been lost in the closing or decrease in numbers and interest of schools, and where there was anything discouraging it was very frankly reported. Nearly every report brought up some practical consideration which was taken up in general discussion. From Concord came the question, "Do our First-day schools operate towards strengthening our meetings?"

A feeling of discouragement was expressed that the young people of the older classes of the First-day school and those who have gone out from them are not found at our business meetings nor our mid-week meetings. In many places where there are schools the young people do not stay to meeting or come in time for it where school is after meeting. As one contributing cause of this it was mentioned that often the older members do not identify themselves with the First-day school. It was also suggested that young Friends be put to work in connection with the business of the Society, that they be asked to serve on committees and made to feel that they are members of the meeting. Again it was said that in many cases the business of our meetings is and has been for years in the hands of older Friends who have their way of transacting it and of conducting the meetings. The younger members not having been brought up to have an active part in it cannot naturally fall into the ways of a past generation and would not want to urge or suggest any departure that would seem unnecessary to the older Friends. And so they do not take an active part, but they are interested in the living testimonies of the Society and are ready to take the places of the older ones as they drop out. They have no thought of letting the work of the Society stop with the passing away of those now bearing the burdens.

The help that the Buck Hill Falls Assembly last summer had been to the teachers who attended or had felt its influence was brought up in the Haddonfield report.

The Philadelphia Union, which has been recently reorganized, reported having held First-day school teachers' round-tables. No general invitation is given to the meetings as the object is to have present only those who are actually engaged in teaching. No program is arranged, no subject announced, no speaker appointed. The meetings are entirely informal. Questions are asked and answered, and subjects suggested by experience with classes are discussed. Also, any books that any teacher has found helpful are brought to the round-table and discussed. The plan as carried out in the city is to have these round-table meetings for primary teachers, intermediate teachers and so on, separately. A report of one of them will be found in FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER for Tenth month 31st, page 699, with a list of helpful books.

From two of the Unions came up the report that the Discipline is studied in certain classes of their schools as a regular part of their curriculum. In the discussion it was suggested that it would be well if a thorough study of the Discipline could be made by each scholar sometime during the First-day school course.

The suggestion was urged upon Unions that they take up First-day school missionary work within their borders; that if there are meetings where no school is held, or if there is any place where Friends might to advantage have a school, such a place be looked up and care and encouragement be given them. One report gave a very encouraging account of starting a school in a meeting-house where the meeting had been discontinued for years. The morning session ended with roll-call of delegates.

During a noon recess lunch was served by the Philadelphia Friends to all in attendance.

The afternoon session began at 2 o'clock. The delegates who had met as a nominating committee during the recess proposed as clerk and assistant clerk for the ensuing year John L. Carver and Anna R. Waln.

It was decided to send to Isaac H. Hillborn, who was prevented from being present by serious illness, the following message: "Our much beloved friend, in loving sympathy we desire to express our heartfelt appreciation of thy valued service in the promotion of the First-day school cause in which we are now engaged. A living exercise came over us as thy absence was noticed and a desire was expressed that this message should be conveyed to thee. May the strength and support of our Heavenly Father be granted thee, is the desire of thy friends."

A letter from Genesee First-day School Association in session at the time of yearly meeting at Bloomfield, Ontario, Canada, was read.

The program was then taken up, beginning with the question, "How Can We Arouse Our Young People Educated in our First-day Schools to their Obligations in continuing the work?" Herbert P. Worth opened the discussion with a paper, part of which, in substance, is as follows:

The first concern of the First-day school is not its own self-preservation. The broad and true service of religious organization is something very different from perfecting and maintaining its own machinery. But if the pupils of the First-day school of to-day are not ready and willing to fill the vacancies in the working force of the school of to-morrow, then we are falling short in our efforts to touch their spiritual natures, to arouse in them an appreciation of great fundamental truths, to create a zeal in behalf of righteousness; or else we fail to inspire in them a confidence in the First-day school as an efficient means. In either event it is sufficient notice that our methods need mending. On the other hand if our classes are yielding up concerned minds and willing hands, lives that are ready to consecrate some of their best endeavor in the support and development of that effort that has been already exerted in their behalf, then we may fairly feel that the labor of the past has not been in vain.

If the conduct of the First-day school is in the hands of those who undertake it as a species of mental and spiritual diversion, to be indulged in largely at convenience; or if it be an effort grudgingly given to help maintain that which is recognized as a very proper sort of an institution, or if it be a formal endeavor to cancel what one feels in a vague way to be a kind of religious obligation, none will be keener to realize those conditions than the pupils. They will not be aroused to an esteem for the organization itself, if officers and teachers are readily diverted from their task by every passing hindrance; if the unfavorable morning, or the slight indisposition, or the presence of the guest in the house, or the social opportunity, or weariness from the indulgences of a previous day, or the pressing of other responsibilities are allowed easily to account for absence. Even the children know that these things are not permitted to interfere with our business engagements, if indeed even with our amusements and social activities, and they will not be slow to form their conclusions as to our own estimate of the relative importance of the First-day school. Zeal and enthusiasm are contagious and earnestness and consecration of effort cannot be without their immediate influence on the pupils.

Closely allied in importance with the regularity in attendance of officers and teachers is that of pupils. Unfortunately in this the school wages an unfair contest with the home. The home influence often makes tardiness and irregularity of attendance easy, indeed sometimes makes anything else impossible. The only weapon with which to offset this is the creation of interest and devotion in the pupil. It must not be allowed as an excuse for unsuccessful effort, but must be considered rather the reason for more persistent and earnest endeavor.

Having your pupil there regularly and on time is only the first step. If his interest and active sympathy are to be maintained, he must be made to feel that there is some definite direction to its efforts. Its influence must actually take hold of him in a very real manner.

The ultimate purpose of the First-day school is not different from that of the meeting. The distinguishing element is the educational feature. Its function is to establish for noble Christian character, a foundation in knowledge. To be effective it must submit itself to methods akin to those which govern other educational work. It must recognize the developing capacity and changing interest of the growing mind. The recognition of the truly educational nature of our work, the arrangement of material for study so that it may be best adapted to the need and understanding of each age, the systematizing and grading of the lessons, has a direct bearing upon our question; for it will not only be effective in retaining the pupils' continuing interest but will go a long way in convincing him that the work is worth giving effort to.

But this strictly educational work is only a part of the service of the school. Its deepest concern is the unfolding of the spiritual life, the strengthening of every aspiration toward the goodness that is Divine, the ennobling and enriching of every upward impulse of the human heart. In this the utmost precaution is required. We cannot force spiritual growth. With the advance in the direction of maturity, more and more, must the teacher become to his pupil at the same time associate, confidant, counsellor.

We often do not rightly estimate the hindering forces that have yet, at the very threshold of manhood and womanhood to be contended with; the concerns and requirements of newly entered business life; the attraction and demands of a widening social existence; the multiplying of interests and activities. At this most important crisis in the lives of our young people the hold we seemed to have on them has been allowed to slip away too soon. We long for their service in the work that needs them so much, but just at this moment we lose them. They had seemed to be equipped and alert but they had not been steadied by responsibility. Responsibility is a confirming, an establishing force.

Instead of withholding until it is too late a participation in the responsibilities of First-day school work the young people may early be made to feel that the work is indeed, in part, their own.

We must not overlook the value of the very young teacher, sometimes, and besides, if all may not be teachers, there is a varying field of activity and useful service. Even in smaller schools there is the library to care for, absent ones to be looked after, new recruits to be sought and invited, philanthropic work, social occasions to be planned for. The same one or two need not assume all these functions.

Emma W. Gaskill continuing the discussion, started with the thought, "Whenever there is a need to be met, or a truth to be spoken, there God is, calling His friends to service." We could reach the young people not by a direct appeal to that of which they are unconscious. Not so much of duty would she speak to them as of love; that they might be filled with a very passion of love for a Father who loves them, not because they are good, not because they are bad, but just because He is their Father. Let them learn through this love that duty is no cold lifeless thing to freeze out of life all of its joy and delight, but really God's messenger. It is because they are unconscious of their royal descent that we find young people, not so much shirking their obligations, as unable to realize them. They must be impressed that spirituality and faith have as great a part in their lives as body and reason. We must go and gather them in. They will not of themselves come to us for the silence, or the preaching, or the work, if they are unconscious of the need of the soul within them for spiritual food.

Estelle Hall Speakman, speaking on the same subject said, We are all young together, whether we are children or whether we are eighty years old. The First-day school is not distinct from the meeting; the one shades into the other. The old and young must be close together in meeting, in First-day school, in the home. There must be no lines drawn. Grown-ups must not insist on doing our way, we must work with the children in their way.

Alfred Darnell in a paper on the subject gave as the three qualifications of a good worker: First, knowledge; second, a firm faith in God as revealed to us in the Scriptures and in our own hearts; third, an enthusiastic desire to promote brotherly love and charity as taught by Jesus.

A paper by C. Percy Major on a "Systematic Study of the Bible as the Best Means for Christian Development," was read in his absence by Mary H. Whitson.

This was followed by a general discussion taken part in by Allen Flitcraft, Joel Borton, Sarah Flitcraft, Albert Johnson, Mary MacAllister, Ethel Coates and others. It was brought out that there have been recently in at least three of the First-day schools distinct revivals. And these movements of renewed interest and deepened sense of responsibility have in each case come about from within, at the hands of the young people themselves.

The meeting closed with the feeling, as expressed by one of long experience in First-day school work, that the session had been one of unusual helpfulness.

TRIBUTE TO THE MEMORY OF EZEKIEL ROBERTS.

WHEN a good man passes on, his life ended, so far as we can know it in this world, we desire to express in some measure our appreciation of it and wherein the life has been for us a light in darkness and a moral purpose helping us to steadfastness. Also, to manifest so far as we are able in tempered words, some of the love and reverence such a life inspired, a life filled at times almost to overflowing with the Divine Spirit as was that of our dear friend.

Ezekiel Roberts, the son of Richard and Mary Scott Roberts, was born in Montgomery County, Pennsylvania, the first of Eleventh month, 1813. His ancestry on his father's side was Welsh, being of those who came over with one of William Penn's companies. From his mother he had Scotch blood. She was the daughter of Alexander Scott, a Friend.

The period when Ezekiel Roberts was born, early in the nineteenth century, was the dawn of all real American life. Up to this time there was more or less chaos in government and also in social life, and to have been favored by birth in a community where no matter what the turmoil of State there was a steadfast holding of orderly peace was indeed a privilege, for Montgomery County was not only largely settled, but whole townships were owned, by those who came from Wales and Holland with William Penn, and were all of the Society of Friends. This constituted a surrounding which contributed to stability of character and correctness of life.

The mother of Ezekiel Roberts dying when some of the seven children were young, the home was broken up and the children scattered among the relatives. After drifting about somewhat Ezekiel went to live with his uncle, Cadwallader Roberts, of Gwynedd, who was a tailor. From him he learned this trade, which he followed for a number of years. It seemed to suit his gentle, peace-loving nature, which would have shrunk from the sharp elbowing of a keener business life. About 1836 he followed his eldest brother, Israel, to Ohio, and went to work at his trade at Kinsey's Woolen Mills, known now as Pleasant Valley, in Belmont County, a few miles from St. Clairsville. He made his home with his brother, following his trade and finding congenial young associates among those who were mostly Friends; he also attended the meeting at St. Clairsville.

On the removal of his brother Israel and family, in 1838, to New Trenton (now Emerson), he accompanied them and opened a shop, which was very prosperous by reason of his skill in fashioning Friends' garments. The cut and fit and nice workmanship of his coats and vests especially brought him custom from long distances, and such was his fidelity that he never lost a customer. He loved his trade, liked to handle and work with fine cloth such as the Friends of that time preferred to wear, perhaps from motives of economy, believing the fine wool wore better.

In Third month, 1841, he married Elizabeth Ann Griffith. This was a happy and most satisfactory union. The wife, a great-niece of John Woolman, was a woman of ability and sterling worth, with fine ideas of justice and a grasp upon them which held the balance even and steady. This, supplementing his nature with a greater energy of positiveness, was a help to him in the material things of life, lifting cares from his shoulders to her own, while her unfailing sympathy and oneness with him in his spiritual experience gave him the strength his nature craved and needed. He told a friend late in his life that he never turned to her in any extremity of doubt or trial or perplexity but he found the needed response.

Through all his life a consistent member of the Society of Friends, and fully imbued with the spirit of his Society, always kindly and peace-loving, it would not seem that there was either a need or a possibility of what, for want of a better designation, is termed conversion, or change of heart. His eldest brother said of him that he was as nearly perfect in his sweetness of temper, his kindness, his magnanimity and generosity as a boy could be; this from the one who knew his boyhood best was a precious tribute. But to such natures more than those of more self-assertion comes a time of questioning, and it came to him, shadowing him as he went about his daily work for quite a period.

All at once the cloud lifted and a great light came, suddenly filling his whole being—as he said, it filled the room. He sprang from his work and stood almost overpowered. He was filled with light and with joy. So happy was he that he was ready, like Samuel, to cry out, "Whatsoever thou hast for me to do, Lord, I am ready!" Then came the call to obedience. Things loved as simple pleasures, now considering them stumbling blocks, he felt must be laid down. He liked to wear fine cloth, and to have his clothes made of the best, but because he cared so much for dress he felt it was an impediment in the way of his higher life. From that time, so long as he lived, his clothing, always neat and plain in cut, was never of costly material. He loved music, played skillfully upon the flute just for his own and a friend's pleasure, but this also he felt he must resign lest it prove an obstacle, through all his life he loved to hear sweet music, loved the bird songs, and every tuneful thing in nature. So in the early anti-slavery days he became convinced not only of the wrong of slavery, but that it was wrong for him to uphold it in any way, and refrained from using any of the product of slave labor, abstaining from the use of sugar when free sugar could not be obtained. But the gentle tolerance which was a part of his conscientious living always kept him from insisting that his family observe the same. It was right for him, but each must find the light for him or herself.

(Conclusion to follow.)

JOHN.

GOLDEN TEXT.—He that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen cannot love God whom he hath not seen.—1. John, iv., 20.

Before study of Lesson read 1. John, ii., 1-29;

11. John, i., 1-13.

THE four remaining books of the New Testament bear the name of the "beloved apostle"—three epistles and the book of Revelation. It may be accepted as practically certain that the writer of the fourth gospel was also the writer of the epistles of John. The authorship of Revelation will be considered in the next lesson.

We have surprisingly small information concerning the apostolic labors of John. His personality is not impressed upon the reader of Acts as is that of Peter; and there is no mention of him beyond mere allusion in Paul's epistles. We must keep the fact before us that none of the gospels were written until the sixth decade after Christ, and that John's gospel did not appear until the early part of the second century. So the epistles of Paul all precede the gospels, while the epistle of James and that to the Hebrews precede all but Mark.

John accompanied Peter to the temple at the time of the healing of the lame man and shared in the arrest and trial which followed (Acts, iii. and iv.). It was again Peter and John who were sent to Samaria to receive into full fellowship those converted by Philip (Acts, viii., 14). There is no mention of John in connection with the execution of his brother James, "son of Zebedee," and the persecution of Peter by Herod Agrippa; and the author of Acts ignores him altogether in the story of the Christian council at Jerusalem, which dealt with the question of Paul's Gentile converts (Acts, xv.). He is mentioned in Paul's letter to the Galatians (ii., 9), as being present with James and Peter at a similar council dealing with a similar subject; scholars differ as to whether or no this was the same occasion. It is probable that John left Jerusalem about the time of the execution of James, the brother of Jesus, since Simeon, another brother of Jesus, was unanimously put forward as the head of the mother church at that time, and no reference is made to the "beloved apostle." It is very likely that he left Palestine altogether at this time (between 62 and 66), and went to Ephesus, with which church his name is so intimately associated. From Ephesus it is supposed were written the three letters before us, probably between 80 and 90 A.D., or even a little later. They are of great value as throwing light on a period of the early history of Christianity, of which very little is known.

James wrote to the Christian Jews of the Dispersion, warning them against the danger of separating their faith from their active life. The author of Hebrews wrote especially to the Jews of Palestine striving to avert the danger to their faith arising from the death of their leaders and the long delay in the second coming of their Master. Peter wrote to support the Christians of Syria under persecution, and again to combat the heresy that to the faithful no act could be sin. Jude's brief letter is to the same purpose as Peter's second.

John's letters have to do with another "heresy," and are especially characteristic of the people of Syria and Asia Minor, "a besetting mental tendency . . . towards an ultra-spiritualism, rooted in a prejudice against a corporeal life as such, as if the Divine had or could have nothing to do with the flesh. To such thought Christ could be divine only by having nothing to do with the flesh" (Bartlett). Those who adopted this view were obliged to deny the reality of the sufferings of Jesus on the cross and to make of him during his whole career a kind of phantom or spirit appearing in the form of a man. A modification of this view asserted that at the time of the baptism of Jesus, the heavenly spirit united temporarily with the man Jesus to accomplish the work of the Christ, separating again from him before the crucifixion. Such a view, of course, makes the active career of Jesus a kind of theatrical performance in which the Christ poses as a man without actually passing through human experiences at all. Against this view the living witnesses of the career of Jesus united heartily in telling of that which they had seen and heard. It is not unlikely that the collecting of the facts of the life of Jesus in the gospels was, in part, the outcome of this effort.

In his first epistle, which a great Bible scholar has called John's preface to the fourth gospel, John refers several times to this false teaching. He does not seem to imply that many of those to whom he writes are likely to adopt the heresy, but only wishes to guard against its intrusion. The letter is by no means an argument; it is an earnest affectionate appeal for faithfulness in every act to their high calling. The writer still believes that the end of all things is at hand: "Little children, it is the last hour" (I. John, ii., 18). And being the last hour, what a terrible thing it would be to let go of that faith which they had so truly kept until now. Already the antichrist is among them—"Who is the liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ?" (I. John, ii., 22). Many false prophets are abroad. Here is a sure test: "Every spirit which confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is of God" (I. John, iv., 2). Especially noteworthy throughout this epistle is the insistence on love of the brethren as an absolute essential to the Christian faith (ii., 9-11; iii., 10; iii., 14-16; iii., 18; iv., 7, 8; iv., 18-21).

The second epistle of John seems to be directed to an individual church. It is very brief, consisting of an exhortation to love one another, and a warning against deceivers who "confess not that Jesus Christ cometh in the flesh" (II. John, i., 7). It closes with a promise of a personal visit at an early date.

The third letter is a personal one, introducing an evangelist (III. John, v. and xii.), commending the recipient, Gaius, for his kindness to brethren and strangers, and promising an early visit. Gaius was probably of the church to which the second epistle was sent (III. John, ix.). Incidentally we are introduced to an unfriendly elder, who is the head of the church in question (III. John, ix., 12).

UNITY OF THE FRIENDS' SCHOOL SYSTEM.

In the original organization of meetings great care was taken to make the smaller branches dependent upon a central body to which reports of the condition of, and work done in the scattered meetings should be submitted. This plan of centralization has been found so satisfactory that all related work among Friends, except their schools, is arranged on the same general plan. Among the schools the original condition was absolute isolation of interests and management. Each school was a separate unit of work entirely independent of every other school similarly organized. Various efforts have been made to secure some relation of interests and harmony of action.

Conferences to call together teachers and committees from all sections have been frequently held. A central Educational Committee in each Yearly Meeting considers the needs of the schools within its jurisdiction, and offers suggestions and assistance. Partial supervision has at various times been tried, and is now being given more scope than formerly. Lack of absolute authority on the part of a Superintendent under our present organization, limits his field of usefulness to the schools. The schools in and near Philadelphia endeavor to keep their work in the same line by frequent meetings of their teachers and some efforts have been made thus far with very limited success, to grade the outlying schools according to a uniform standard. Our one college is desirous to accept the certificate of Friends' schools whenever possible, and has established partial scholarships in several schools to create a bond of interest between the schools and college.

The desire for a unification of Friends' Schools into a system seems general, yet notwithstanding this, the real conditions now existing are very remote from educational solidarity. The courses offered by our various high schools embrace substantially the same subjects and amount of work, but arranged in so different an order, that students in passing from one school to another lose much time in the transition. The certificates of teachers are not usually accepted for work done in other schools of what purports to be the same system, on account of the lack of any uniformity in the work done. The rural schools below the high school grade maintain any standard that is convenient.

In the city of Philadelphia uniformity in the study courses is observed in all schools preparatory to the Central School, but this uniformity extends imperfectly into the management of the schools on account of the number of different principals who are each at work in her own way. The same fact complicates the educational machinery of the city schools, and necessarily increases the expense of conducting them.

At present there is an active concern among many Friends as to the best means of unifying our school interests, and a desire not only to preserve the standards and uphold the reputation which the Friends' schools won for themselves in the past, but to increase their efficiency and usefulness.

Centralization of authority would make the problem easier at least, by shaping the policy of the schools according to a single ideal, rather than according to the composite judgment of so many people where clearness of purpose is obscured by the multitude of inharmonious details that enter into the management. A recent writer in the British Friend criticises the English school system as being made up of water-tight compartments where free circulation of the currents from primary school to university is the need of education. We may apply this criticism with considerable force to our own condition.

THE WORK OF BOOKER T. WASHINGTON.

We often make it impossible to put ourselves in the right attitude toward truth by taking sides. We insist on everybody's being either one thing or the other. In regard to the negro question, if one is interested in Dr. Washington and his work he is supposed to be opposed to Professor DuBois and his ideals for the "talented tenth" of the race. Why can we not be interested in the work at Tuskegee for those for whom it is intended and yet be interested in the opportunity for a college education for those young negroes who are prepared to take it and to make good use of it?

Now some one has come along with another reason why we should not give honor to Dr. Washington. He insists that Frederick Douglass was a greater man than Washington, and that in paying so much honor to the present-day leader of a large part of his race we are disloyal to the great leader of a former generation. Surely we can be interested in the great work of the one in "helping his people to do their duty by themselves," without being disloyal to the other who "devoted himself largely to endeavoring to persuade the white people to do their duty by the blacks." Undoubtedly we need a Douglass to-day, but we need a Washington, too, and to disparage the work of the one who is working with his people from their own point of view will not bring us the man, white or black, who will take the lead in the, perhaps, far more difficult task of bringing the white people of the South and of the North to do their part in solving the problem of the two races.

At a recent meeting of ministers in one of the large cities a stirring address was made by one of them on Booker Washington and his great work. In the discussion another minister called attention to the work of their own denomination for the education of the negroes. He said they ought to be supporting that better instead of using their energy to help the work they were not responsible for. Then Tuskegee and its Principal came in for some pretty severe criticism. Dr. Washington was even pronounced an enemy of religion, a materialist and a teacher of materialism to his people. But this meeting finally came to the very wise conclusion that the denomination they represent has a distinctive work to do in its schools for the colored people, and that its members ought to support this work with all their energy and means and not leave it to take up a hue and cry after a leader who happens to be conspicuous; that, at the same time, they need not disparage the work of Booker T. Washington because it is not their work and because it is along different lines.

The recent meeting of the Minnesota State Federation of Women's Clubs at Mankato, was notable in one respect. The women made a special point of coming plainly dressed and did not devote any of the time to receptions or other dress occasions.

One entire session was devoted to the discussion of Charles Wagner's "Simple Life" and the problems suggested by it. The discussion was followed by a lecture on these problems which was listened to with great interest. Surely such an attitude toward simple living by so large and representative a body of women is worthy of more than passing notice.

DEATHS.

BLACKBURN.—At his home in Fishtown, Tenth month 21st, 1903, Azariah Blackburn, aged 75 years; a life-long member of Dunning's Creek Monthly Meeting.

Throughout his life he was most devoted to the principles of Friends, his seat seldom being vacant in our meetings. He was honest and upright in all business relations. As a parent he was worthy of the love of his family, which was so richly bestowed upon him. We feel our loss most keenly, but are grateful for the uplift which such a life gives us. "Mark the perfect man and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace."

BRINTON.—At her home near Christiana, Tenth month 29th, Rebecca W. Brinton, wife of Cyrus Brinton, in her 72d year; a life-long member of Sadsbury Monthly Meeting. She was a daughter of Thomas Whitson, of anti-Slavery fame.

FISHER.—Eleventh month 2d, 1903, at his home, Fleming, Pa., Ellwood Fisher, son of the late William P. Fisher, in the 48th year of his age; a member of Centre Monthly Meeting.

HAVILAND.—On Tenth month 31st, 1903, at Pleasant Hill, Byberry, Philadelphia, Pa., the home of her nephew, Edward Comly, Sarah C. Haviland, widow of the late James C. In the "passing on" of this beautiful life we feel a great void in our hearts and a loneliness inexpressible, but we are comforted with the thought that her loving spirit will ever brighten our pathway, and as "the rose that has faded leaves its fragrance," so will her sweet, humble spirit leave its influence. Her Christian virtues were bright jewels in her daily life, causing us to rejoice that we have known and loved her.

PICKERING.—At the home of her grandfather, Edward Pickering, Woodbourne, Bucks county, Pa., Eighth month 14th, 1903, Emily W., daughter of John R. and Hannah G. C. Pickering, aged 19 months.

COMMUNICATIONS.

MACAULAY ON WILLIAM PENN.

EDITORS FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

I note with interest, that in last issue of the INTELLIGENCER Warwick P. Miller inquires concerning the refutation of the charges made by Macaulay against William Penn. In addition to the authorities cited in the reply, it may be stated a small book devoted to the subject is in existence. It is probably rare in America. The copy in the Westtown Library bears the imprint:

"An inquiry into the evidence relating to the charges brought by Lord Macaulay against William Penn, by John Paget, esq., Barrister-at-law, William Blackwood & Sons, Edinburgh & London, 1859, 138 pp." This is doubtless the fullest statement of the case anywhere in print. An article in the North American Review for Tenth month 1861 devotes some space to the same inquiry. The latest edition of Hepworth Dixon's book intimates that Macaulay was disposed to retract somewhat, in his last years, but the authorized Life of Lord Macaulay by his nephew George Otto Trevelyan gives no indication of such a thing.

NOTES.

THE following is a minute made at Pilesgrove Monthly Meeting Ninth month 29th :

" In returning the minute to attend the Yearly Meetings of Indiana and Ohio, and the meeting at Blue River in Indiana, given him in Fifth month last, to Pilesgrove Monthly Meeting, Ninth month 29th, Joel Borton stated :

" That in this visit he met with Friends in isolated localities where visitors in the ministry seldom go.

" In Cincinnati, a company of about 25 persons have formed an association for the advancement of Friends principles, meeting once each month.

" The meeting here was laid down a few years ago, and these people are not connected with any meeting, but a love of the principles led them, about five years ago, to start this association, and they have some hopes of re-establishing a meeting and being attached to Indiana Yearly Meeting. He remained with them nearly a day, holding a religious meeting with a social opportunity at its close.

" He then proceeded to Salem, Indiana, near where Blue River Quarterly Meeting is held once in the year. The meeting-house recently built and neatly furnished, is situated about three miles from the town, and in its near vicinity is found about 150 Friends, mostly thrifty people, living on well cultivated farms. It has been a Friendly centre for near 100 years and is a branch of Illinois Yearly Meeting, but distant from the parent body nearly 300 miles, and being out of the usual line of travel, our friend was informed that but one other ministering Friend from the East had ever visited them. Still they have maintained their meeting and its membership, having now with them a large number of young people, many of whom take an active part in the meeting. This interest and friendly feeling so well maintained, seemed measurably due to the activity and influence of Elwood Trueblood, now many years a recorded minister, beloved by all, the young as well as those more advanced in years. He is about 70 years of age, and still maintains his hold upon the people and his interest in extending our principles. It can be said of him, that he is not without honor in his own country.

" The visit here extended over two days, four meetings were held and social visits made in many homes. The meetings were well attended, the last being of a devotional character, several young Friends and others taking part. A social opportunity followed in which all joined, and as the farewells were said, many expressions of satisfaction were given, the feeling prevailed that the visit had been a profitable one.

" Our friend then proceeded to Richmond, Indiana, there to attend the Indiana Yearly Meeting, which was found to be one of much deep feeling and helpfulness. The committee, of which our friend was one, on isolated members, appointed by the seven yearly meetings, had arranged to meet here at this time, bringing a number of Friends from the other yearly meetings and adding much interest to this meeting.

" Following this came Ohio Yearly Meeting, held at Salem, Ohio. Here the Central Committee met on the previous Sixth-day, and selected a place and arranged a program for the next General Conference. The Yearly Meeting followed ; this though not large, was a season of deep baptism, and earnest words and thoughts were expressed, for not only its preservation but the extension of its meetings and its usefulness.

" This closed the work as outlined in the minute and our friend returned home. A retrospect of the journey brought with it the comforting feeling that he had done what he could in spreading the Gospel Truth and in extending God's Kingdom in the earth."

The fourth number in the London Friends' Tract Association's series of " Friends Ancient and Modern," is a sketch of the life of Etienne de Grellet, the French refugee, who came to be a powerful and much loved minister among Friends to whom he has always been known by the English name of Stephen Grellet. This and the other brief biographies in the series is written with a view to readers not familiar with the testimonies and history of Friends. They are very convenient for those actively interested in the advancement of Friends' principles to keep on hand to give about to any who might become interested. (Headley Brothers, London, one penny. May be imported through Friends' Book Store, Philadelphia.)

In the autumn number of the Friends' Quarterly Examiner (Tenth month) Joshua Rowntree has an article on " Public Opinion in Australia," and there is also an article on " Quakerism in Australia." Other articles are " A Finlander's View of the Temperance Question," " How the Study of the Mind of Man is a Help in Understanding some Old Testament Stories," " The Best Practical Methods for Dealing with the Unemployed." A particularly interesting feature of the number is a Symposium on the Ministry consisting of articles by Caroline Stephen, Frances Thompson, Elsie M. Cadbury, Charles Sharp, W. F. H. Alexander, and J. Wilhelm Rowntree.

The new Friends' Meeting-house, at the corner of Owen and Stratford avenues, Lansdowne, Pa., the building of which has been watched with so much interest, is now about completed and will be formally opened on Seventh-day evening, Eleventh month 21st. There will be exercises by the First-day school pupils, and addresses by Henry W. Wilbur and others, and all who desire to attend will receive a cordial welcome. The first regular meeting for worship will be held on the following First-day at 11 a. m., preceded by the First-day school at 9.45 a. m.

Charles Robinson from Chappaqua, N. Y., also David R. Underhill and wife from Brooklyn, attended the White Plains Meeting on the 8th of Eleventh month.

Isaac Wilson is expected in attendance at Centre Quarterly Meeting at Grampian, Pa., on the 14th to 16th of this month.

PHILADELPHIA QUARTERLY MEETING.

PHILADELPHIA QUARTERLY MEETING was held at Race Street Meeting-house, Philadelphia, Eleventh month 3d. In the public meeting at 10 a. m. Friends were strongly urged to confront the problems of modern Christianity and the new conditions surrounding Friends, by being sincere and uncompromising in their loyalty to the principles of the Society. Margaret Howard, of Germantown, said, " If we are individually faithful in following the leadings of that inspeaking word there will be no dissatisfaction when we do not hear the spoken word in our meetings. And if each one of us were more faithful, there would be no deficiency in the ministry. Intellectual training and education are not the only requisites for the ministry ; of far greater necessity is the honest, pure and faithful spirit." Edwin Buffington, of Rising Sun, Md., also urged individual faithfulness and sincerity. Other speakers were Joseph Livezey, of Mickleton, N. J. ; Robert Hatton, Sarah R. Eavanson and Samuel Sharp.

In the men's meeting for business, in the absence of Isaac H. Hillborn, Harrison Streeter, the assistant clerk, was appointed clerk for the day. Louis B. Ambler and Aquilla J. Linvill acted as assistant clerks for the day.

Reports were received from the four constituent monthly meetings, Philadelphia, Green Street, Radnor and Exeter, with answers to the First, Third and Eighth queries. The answers to the Second and Eighth especially brought forth expression from the meeting.

The Philanthropic Committee made an important report of its work and plans. Two conferences on temperance had been held under its care, one at Merion with an address by Dr. Joseph S. Walton, and one in the Presbyterian church at Port Kennedy with an address by Henry W. Wilbur. Help had been given toward the building of a school house among the Doukhobors. Literature had been distributed among railroad employees and others. Plans were under way to furnish support for two probation officers.

A growing work under the care of the Committee is that centering about Friends' Neighborhood Guild at Beech street and Fairmount avenue, Philadelphia. The experiment was tried last year of having a resident superintendent, and it is intended to look toward having a permanent resident, efforts being under way to raise funds for this purpose.

Among the activities of the Guild are a First-day school, a saving fund, a manual-training class. An appeal was made for more workers as the work that can be done is limited only by the number of those who can be depended on to help. The usual appropriation of $250 was made for the use of the committee.

THE FRIENDS' HOME FOR CHILDREN.

The Annual Donation Day of the Friends' Home for Children, will occur on Fifth-day, Eleventh month 12th, at the Home, 4011 Aspen Street, West Philadelphia. In addition to money which is badly needed to make up a considerable shortage in the Treasury we would be glad to receive donations of groceries, provisions, clothing, and any other articles our friends may be willing to donate. Our country friends could send a very welcome donation in the form of produce which is not marketable, but which at the same time would be valuable to us. Cash donations can be sent to the Treasurer, George D. Miller, 313 N. 33d Street, Philadelphia, or the notice about other donations can be sent to the Secretary, Edward C. Dixon, 1420 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

SOME PROBLEMS OF AN ADULT CLASS.

[Read at Westbury Quarterly Meeting First-day School Conference, at Flushing, L. I., Tenth month 23d, by Margaret F. Vail.]

PROBABLY the best way to present the subject chosen for our consideration this afternoon is to relate the circumstances which led us to ask the questions, (1) "What is the best method of conducting an adult or Bible class?" and (2) "What relation should the adult class bear to the rest of the school?" A few years since our school realized the advisability, I might almost say the necessity, of an adult class, not alone for the benefit that would be derived by the members of such a class or for the encouragement of adult workers already in the school, but for the purpose of holding a class of boys ranging in age from fifteen to twenty years; boys who had grown up in the school, but were beginning to feel unpleasantly conspicuous where all the other members were smaller boys and girls or little children. An adult class was formed at that time and has continued with varying success ever since, sometimes with and sometimes without a teacher or leader.

The class has always used the same lessons that the other classes were using, that all might be interested in the same topic and all take part in the review exercises at the close, each class being called on to give for the benefit of the others, what they had found to be the most helpful and practical thought to be drawn from the lesson. These exercises were much enjoyed, and when some members of the adult class felt that those lessons were not the most helpful for that class and wished to take up some entirely different topic, as "The History of Friends," and withdraw from the closing exercises, others clung to the original idea, feeling that the school needed the help and encouragement that the older class could give by using the same lessons. However, with the opening of our First-day school the first of this month all felt that the time had come for a change in the course of study for the adult class, and especially so as the Friend who consented to take charge of it requested that it be known as the "Bible class" as he wished to teach the lessons direct from the Bible. Then the questions arose "What would be the best way to take up a study of the Bible?" "Has there been any special line of Bible study marked out for Friends' schools?" "Would it be better for our class to follow the lesson leaf topics and still keep in touch with the other classes, or would it be better to select an entirely independent line of study and let our relations with the rest of the school be kept up in some other line of general exercises?" These questions had been asked in a meeting of our First-day School Committee, and were still unanswered when there was read to us the notice sent out by the Committee of Arrangements for this conference, asking what we considered the most profitable subject in the interest of our First-day school that should claim the attention of the conference.

REPORT OF FRIENDS' BOARDING HOME OF CONCORD QUARTERLY MEETING.

To the Quarterly Meeting to be held at Darby, Tenth month 27th, 1903.

A WELCOME awaits all interested persons who wish to visit our "Home."

The twelfth year of its existence has been completed with harmony prevailing within its family circle.

Many firesides are represented here, each member bringing new life to the Home, and through the comforts they receive, increasing the interest in the neighborhood from which they come, thus enlarging the usefulness of the Home.

The Matron who has been so true to her trust through all these early years of the Home's existence, and helped to place it in good running order, felt last spring she must be released from its care.

The committee with sincere appreciation of her work accepted her resignation and have been fortunate in finding a temporary matron, Ann P. Sharples, to take her place. She entered upon her duties Seventh month 1st, 1903.

Since our last report five Friends have entered the Home as permanent boarders. This addition so filled the building that in many instances those desiring to spend a short time as transients could not be accommodated.

The household at the present time numbers thirty-one.

The increasing feebleness and serious illness of several boarders have necessitated much extra help in the way of nursing.

We are thankful that it has been possible to meet these expenses, which would have been provided for with difficulty except for the thoughtfulness of interested friends who from time to time have kindly donated articles needed through the house, as well as table supplies.

We also gratefully acknowledge the continued interest many feel in giving annually for the purchase of coal for the winter's use; as our expenses increase by reason of the advanced price of coal and provisions and the additional nursing, these yearly subscriptions become more necessary than ever.

Since our last report record has been made of four who have entered the higher life: Hannah Paxson on Second month 18th, 1903, she having been a member of the household about nine years; on Sixth month 13th, Joseph Taylor was released after an illness of twenty-four weeks; on Ninth month 9th, Amy C. Pratt, an aged Friend, who had been a long time with us, died after a short illness, and on Ninth month 22d, Amy Pim Williamson passed from this family circle. We believe all these Friends much appreciated the comforts which the Home affords. We also realize more and more that the establishment of these Homes in our Society has met a long-felt need, and we are grateful for the means to carry on the work.

LYDIA H. HALL, President,
MARY McALLISTER, Secretary.

HOME FOR DESTITUTE COLORED CHILDREN.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

Esteemed Friends: As the subject of the enclosed article is a distinctively Philadelphia Charity, and for over 50 years in active work, and depending upon public contributions for its partial support, it may be of interest to some of your-readers to know of the facts therein.—C. T. HARKOP.

The Young Peoples' Auxiliary of the Home for Destitute Colored Children of Philadelphia, gave an entertainment in its interest, the 5th instant, at the Young Friends' Association Building, afternoon and evening.

The object of the Institution is to afford a home for destitute colored children, of our own and neighboring counties, affording them a plain and simple education, and training them to habits of order and industry. Children are admitted between the ages of 3 and 12 years. On this occasion, there was a large attendance, liberal donations and purchases of the fancy work and useful articles, cake and refreshments.

During the afternoon, there was music, and an excellent recitation by Sara S. Bunting. There was supper from 7 to 8, and a social gathering; in the evening, songs by John Harper and by children of the Home, numbering about forty, and a double quartette from Swarthmore College, piano recitals by Milton Griscom and Norman Passmore, and recitations by Miss Furman.

The good order and the interest shown by the children was remarkable, and impressed everyone with their future usefulness and the value of the Institution under its excellent management. It is located at 54th and Berks Streets, Philadelphia, and is in its forty-ninth year.

There was $2,350.00 expended last year for the children over and above the necessary expenses, taxes, etc.

PENNSYLVANIA NATIONAL REFORM CONVENTION.

A CONVENTION is to be held in Harrisburg on Fourth-day and Fifth-day, the 18th and 19th inst., to consider the Christian Principles of Civil Government and various public questions in which these principles are involved. This convention follows immediately the State Sabbath Convention, to be held in the same place on the 16th and 17th inst.

At the first session Dr. Kerr Boyce Tupper, pastor of the First Baptist Church of Philadelphia, will speak on "Christianity and the Immigration Problem." Dr. Floyd W. Tomkins, rector of Holy Trinity Protestant Episcopal Church, Philadelphia, will speak on "Christian America the Hope of the World." "Moral and Religious Influences in our Public Education" will be discussed by Dr. Sylvester F. Scovel, of Wooster University, Ohio, and by Dr. M. G. Brumbaugh, of the University of Pennsylvania. A careful report on the Sabbath laws of all the States, and the judicial decisions relating to them, will be made by Dr. R. C. Wylie, of Pittsburg. Almost one entire session will be devoted to the subject of marriage, divorce, polygamy and the protest against a Mormon Apostle in the Senate of the United States. Dr. D. J. McMillan, formerly missionary in Utah, and afterwards Secretary of the Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church, will speak on our long struggle with polygamy.

All the railroads in the State have arranged to sell round-trip excursion tickets to these two conventions for one and one-third full fare. Tickets going will be sold on Second-Third- and Fourth-days, Eleventh month 16-18, and will be good for return trip till Second-day, the 23d. Those who wish to avail themselves of this offer must obtain card orders from Dr. R. C. Wylie, 209 Ninth street, Pittsburg; or Dr. T. T. Mutchler, 920 Walnut street, Philadelphia; or Dr. T. P. Stevenson, 1233 South Forty-seventh street, Philadelphia.

EDUCATIONAL.

FRIENDS' SCHOOLS AND THE INCREASED DEMAND FOR PRIVATE SCHOOLS.

In the early history of the Society of Friends the school was considered equal in importance to the meeting. It was the rule with William Penn when establishing Friendly communities in America to build a school house near every meeting house. In order that a strong meeting might be had it was deemed essential that the co-operation of a secular school close by should be secured.

There can be no question that the Friends' schools are as valuable to the meetings and the Society in general to-day as ever they were, but owing largely to the great improvement of the public school system during the past few years there has been apparently less demand for private schools and consequently less attention given to them. In many places our Friends' schools have been closed and there are many more meetings than schools throughout the country at this time, but without exception the largest meetings are found near the best Friends' schools.

The public schools have become highly developed and they are indispensable to the welfare of our nation but many of them are crowded and they fail to meet the wants of many families who are seeking private schools, generally preferring those under Friends' direction. The demand for such schools is growing and with this opportunity our Society cannot afford to allow its schools to close.

Private schools in charge of Friends' committees should be increased by encouragement and assistance. They require considerable attention but if practical business methods are applied to their management they will be supported. The influence of a good Friends' school can be seen in a community for several generations. Outside of the meeting itself there is no better place to cultivate Quaker doctrine. They can be made effective promulgators of Friends' principles while fulfilling all secular requirements. They are rich in resource and if kept up will furnish Friendly material constantly. A little child properly started in a Friends' school will form Friendly impressions and associations that may create a desire to complete the education in our higher institutions and finally become a Friend throughout life.

WILLIAM TAYLOR.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE.

The third of the Lecture Course series, given Third-day evening, Eleventh month 3d, consisted of an entertainment by Miss Mabelle Caroline Church, reader. She read the morality play, "Everyman," together with three other selections of a different nature. The pleasing personality of the reader made all of her selections entertaining and interesting.

Fifth-day Dr. William I. Hull delivered a lecture on "The Historic Scenes about Swarthmore." Everyone enjoyed it very much. It was illustrated with lantern slides.

Professor Appleton read Shakespeare's "Twelfth Night" to an appreciative audience on the 6th instant. The delicate sentiment of the play, and the passages of delicious humor were well brought out.

On the 20th instant Dr. Appleton will begin the historical plays with "King John."

Somerville held its regular meeting on Sixth-day. It is gratifying to see that the interest does not lag.

Eunomian likewise met on Sixth-day. There was a debate, "Resolved, That free trade is best for England." The negative side won. A heated discussion arose as to the advantage of the extempore speaking drill. It was decided to continue it.

First-day morning Professor Paul Pearson read a paper in which he quoted Cardinal Newman's hymn, "Lead, Kindly Light."

In the Bible class Mr. Carr, from Indiana, spoke advocating Bible study as a great brace and support in life. The idea was developed that there were four essentials for religious work (1) Ideals, (2) Sound Minds, (3) Will power, (4) Enthusiasm.

President Swain spoke on the same day at Solebury, Bucks county, giving his lecture "A View of Nature and the Bible."

On Seventh-day President Swain attended a conference of college presidents in New York.

Dr. Hull has been appointed chief examiner in history by the College Entrance Examination Board, having served for three years as associate examiner. The Board's examinations were taken last Seventh month by 1,620 candidates for admission to college, and the results have been accepted by all of the colleges and universities of the country. F. N. GEORGE SCHOOL ANNIVERSARY.

The gathering in honor of the Tenth Anniversary of the founding of the George School on last Sixth- and Seventh-days, Eleventh month 6th and 7th, numbered about five hundred. The most impressive and noticeable feature of the occasion was the deeply earnest enthusiasm shown by all in attendance—students, faculty, and committee, past and present. There was the will and determination to advance the interests of the school in every way, and to put it in the forefront of educational institutions.

The celebration began Sixth-day evening when a large audience gathered in the newly-enlarged assembly hall, a great improvement over the former cramped quarters, to hear a Founder's Day address by Hamilton Wright Mabie. The speaker of the evening was introduced by Dr. Walton, who said:

"Ten years ago to-day the George School emerged into the world of educational effort, the child of munificence and religious concern. A place was provided where a thorough preparatory and business training could be secured at moderate cost. A handful of faithful, self-sacrificing workers stood at the doors to welcome the new arrivals. From that hour a series of influences and tendencies commenced that have made George School what it is; from that hour there has radiated out into the world through you endless swells of purpose and resolutions, of determination and effort that in fancy has ripened in the hearts of those who are with us to-night.

"Here is an intangible something, more real than salaries or positions, more real than property or bank accounts; here is something out of which all these things are formed; here is the basis of moral integrity and the corner-stone of the State and Church. Under the genial warmth of good comradeship, under the associations between teacher and pupil these things have been growing here at the George School for the past ten years, and we are gathered home to-night that they may be renewed in the experience of each one.

"We reach out a hand to you, yes, two hands, to bid you welcome to these halls and their precious associations. This hand-grasp is the warmer because every student here shares in it, because every instructor here joins in it, because every member of the committee of management assists in it. Indeed, your welcome finds a hallowed echo in every hall and room and corner in the place. The very rustle of the leaves in the forest take up the echo and waft it along the charming banks of the Neshaminy, and silently scatter it over the peaceful meadow and along the quiet walks by the margin of the brook. Like as the mother prepares for the home-coming of her children at some birthday anniversary of the father, so have we snatched a few minutes from the pressing duties of our daily life to hang some simple token, that you might know the greater heart welcome that glows in every bosom at your coming.

"Like as the birds come back to the old haunts and sing their old songs, moved by the inner promptings of their own natures, so we trust you are with us, not so much as guests, but rather as a part of us, which in every sense of the word you so truly are. Your coming is something more than the arrival of guests at the house of the host; it is more like the calling home of the elder sons and daughters, not only for the renewal of good fellowship, but for a family council, where the welfare of the more youthful members is laid deeply to heart."

Dr. Walton then introduced Hamilton Wright Mabie, who received an enthusiastic reception, being well known to George School audiences.

Following the address an informal reception was held in the library, where the visitors were received by members of the faculty and representatives from the former students.

On Seventh-day morning a foot ball game, between eleven of the two literary societies was played before the formal business meeting of the new association was held. Prof. George H. Nutt, to whose untiring industry the new organization owes much, explained the purposes of the "George School Association." J. Hibberd Taylor, '07, was elected chairman for the day, and Ella Cooper Barnard, '06, secretary. The first business was the adoption of a constitution and by-laws, carefully prepared by an executive committee in charge of the reunion, and the election of officers which resulted as follows:

President, Thomas Baker; first vice-president, Stephen B. Twining; second vice-president, Sarah Knight; secretary, Allie Rohr; treasurer, Lewis E. Walker; registrar, Bess A. Lambert; executive committee from the non-graduates, Lillian Starr, Lloyd Wilson, Wallace G. Murfit, Ella Broomell; from the alumni, Alfred B. Crewitt, '01, Phoebe Eves, '06; from the faculty, Emma Walton; from the General Committee, William Bancroft.

At twelve o'clock the association luncheon was held, and the new and enlarged dining room was crowded to the last inch of space. There was a thorough discussion of an attractive menu, and then Toastmaster George L. Maris, arose, and in a voice shaken with emotion, tried to make himself heard above the tumult of applause that told of the George School appreciation of his love and work for the institution.

In a toast to "Our Benefactors," Emma D. Eyre, of Makefield, a member of the committee, paid deserved tributes to John M. George, the founder; Prof. Maris, the first principal; Charles M. Stabler, always devoted to the institution's best interests; Howard M. Jenkins; William Bancroft, "a man of whom it may truly be said that his right hand does not know what his left hand doeth"; and others always helpful in the work.

Other toasts were these: "World's Work," Thomas Baker; "Our First Faculty," Lettie K. Betts; "Scholarship," A. Davis Jackson; "George School Association," Allie Rohr; "Athletics," William H. Satterthwaite, Jr.

Dr. Walton made a most helpful and pertinent address, brief and showing his deep feeling, telling of the work to be done and of the absolute necessity of co-operation.

The reunion was throughout a success and the gathering was the occasion for many pleasant renewals of friendship, the best purpose of the new organization. The committee in charge included Prof. George H. Nutt, representing the faculty; Prof. George L. Maris, of the ex-faculty; Milton Jackson, of the committee; Bess A. Lambert, of the non-graduates; Irvin F. Paschall of the alumni. To William Bancroft, Charles Thompson and Belle Vansant great credit for the success of the affair is due. I. F. P.

BALTIMORE FRIENDS' SCHOOL.

The Faculty of the Baltimore Friends' School consists of eighteen teachers, ten of whom are members of the Society of Friends. Edward C. Wilson is principal and Eli M. Lamb assistant principal. The whole number of pupils on the roll is 201, which is nine more than last year. Thirty-one of these pupils are Friends and eight have one parent a member. The total debt on the school property one year ago, was $7,919.04. During the past year the income received from the bequest of John Jewett reduced the debt to $6,419.04. The committee in charge is well satisfied with the condition of the school and extends a cordial invitation to all interested in education to visit the classes and see the good work that is being done.

A STRIKE that has been on in the slate quarries of Lord Penryn, in North Wales, was ended on the 7th by a vote of the men, who, however, had gained not a single concession.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

PHILADELPHIA.—The regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association was held on Second-day evening, Eleventh month 9th. The attendance was unusually large, the auditorium being crowded. Nathaniel Janney acted as president.

The Board of Directors of Trustees of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends reported that the trustees had decided to accept a conveyance of the real estate of the Young Friends' Association of Philadelphia. To represent them in the transfer of property Joseph T. Bunting had been appointed.

The following delegates were appointed to attend the meeting of the General Conference of Friends' Associations to be held in Wilmington, on Eleventh month 14th: Emma Wain, Mary Janney, J. Eugene Baker, John Woodall, and Henry Ferris.

A most delightful evening followed, when we were taken through London with Charles Dickens, a ramble guided by Anna M. Earle, of Philadelphia, who charmed us with her informal, happy treatment of the haunts and habits of Dickens's characters. One after another of the familiar figures was graphically brought before us, and Miss Earle infused into her words much of the mingled pathos and humor which is so typical of Dickens. London gained new interest and reality to every listener, and the fine collection of lantern slides made us forget that we were still on this side of the Atlantic.

A pleasant informal half-hour closed one of our most successful meetings.

CAROLINE FARREN COMLY, Secretary.

GIRARD AVENUE, PHILADELPHIA.—The Girard Avenue Friends' Association held its regular meeting Seventh-day evening, Eleventh month 7th. J. Russell Smith gave a very instructive talk on "Religious and Social Conditions of the Time of George Fox," followed by a recitation by Madge Heacock, and a talk on the "Origin and Work of the Red Cross Society," by Walker E. Linvill. The next meeting will be entertained by "A Thanksgiving Dinner," to which all are invited.

PAULINE M. S. MITCHELL, Sec.

BYBERRY, PA.—The Friends' Association held its last meeting Eleventh month 1st, with a fair attendance. The first paper of the afternoon was given by Anna L. Tomlinson in answer to the question, "How can we best give our children an idea of God?" So deftly and beautifully was this subject treated, every word coming from her full, earnest mother heart, that all felt benefited and uplifted. She questioned, "Do we try to give them an idea of God? We help them with their every-day lessons, but the Omnipotent One is seldom mentioned. We evade the question directed to ourselves by asking the same question of others. Yet this should be the very first lesson to be taught, as we teach their little prayers. Young children are easily interested in Bible stories. The busy young matron has little time to sit down to teach, but there are many opportunities of doing it without the regular preparation for it. How do we spend, and teach our children to spend the Sabbath? Do we teach them their duty to give a few hours at the beginning of each week to Him who has done so much for us? Have a large attractive Bible on the table, and a child's inquisitiveness will lead him to look and become interested."

James Q. Atkinson then followed in answer to the question, "Can Friends consistently take part in political affairs?" He said: "We have need of some form of government; we have need to restrain imperfect beings (and such are we); then can Friends step aside and let those less fitted perhaps than we administer this Government? It is largely through William Penn's practical political work that we are able to have a republican form of Government. No one can say he was inconsistent. There are some wrongs now to be righted. There is a large population in the South that is not receiving full justice; the Indians are not well treated; capital punishment is still a blot. So long as the Government commits crimes there is a work for us to do, be we Friends or not. The question of equal suffrage demands attention, when to good and bad men, to wise and ignorant alike, is extended the right of suffrage, while it is denied to a large body of people."

William P. Bonner then gave a paper full of practical suggestions for Friends' Associations. He advocated more committees—one to visit those not attending, one to catalogue the new grave-yard, a historical committee to look up old meeting-houses, a new members' committee, current topics committee, an entertainment committee that shall see to having lectures provided, and a committee on literature, and then the others should not leave all the work for the chairman of each committee to do."

Sallie Ivins gave a recitation on "Heaven." Words of appreciation were given by Sarah C. James, Nathaniel Richardson, Lizzie P. Bonner, and Arabella Carter. At the next meeting Lucretia L. Blankenburg will speak on the subject, "What Friends Have Done for the Advancement of Women." A. C.

AMBLER, PA.—A Conference on "Purity" was held in Ambler Meeting-room on First-day afternoon, Eleventh month 8th, 1903, with a very good attendance. James Q. Atkinson presided. Elizabeth Lloyd addressed the meeting, dealing especially with the training in the home. She said the child should grow up amid good, healthy surroundings, with plenty of sleep and fresh air, and not too much stimulating food. There is a close relationship between cleanliness of body and purity of mind. Boys and girls should be comrades through life; elders should avoid teasing remarks that implant ideas better left until later years. Children will come into contact with impurity, but if their minds have been filled with pure thoughts this will roll off as rain drops do from a cabbage leaf. Harm may be done by talking too much. Teach not what things are impure but what are pure. There are habits in a child which must be guarded against, and simple lessons of physiology and hygiene should be taught early. Lead them, too, to have high ideals of married life; teach them that character and not money brings happiness, that "single blessedness is preferable to double wretchedness."

Boys should not do things that are unclean. Teach them tobacco is an unclean thing. Girls' influence may do much to prevent the habit being formed. Women too often feel they must not interfere with men's pleasures, else they will be disliked; but girls with high ideals are preferred by men.

Attention should be given to books our children read. "John Halifax, Gentleman," was mentioned as a good pure love story and of married life, and Scott's poetry is good and pure. For the cultivation of purity and other virtues follow the advice of Ruskin: "Do not think much of your faults; still less of others' faults. In every person who comes near you look for what is good and strong; honor that, rejoice in it, and as you can, try to imitate it; and your faults will drop off like dead leaves when their time comes."

James Atkinson spoke on purity in business and Dr. Mary Hough on impure politics. Further remarks by Elizabeth Lloyd and Arabella Carter closed the meeting. A. C.

CINCINNATI, O.—The program of the Friends' Association for this year, a copy of which appeared in last week's issue of the INTELLIGENCER, presents a plan of work quite new to the Association. Instead of original papers by the members, sermons, addresses, etc., by well-known writers will be read, following a general outline of subjects as given in the printed program.

The first meeting of the season was held at the home of Dora Gallagher, First-day, Tenth month 25th. The opening silence, which was of more than usual length, was broken by the clerk reading the sixth chapter of Matthew. The topic for the afternoon was "The Simple Life." Edwin Griest read selections from a book on the subject which touched upon almost every phase of life. Through all the selections read ran the thought that true simplicity is something from within, not something that must of necessity show in dress or surroundings; that there can be no true simplicity of life without simple-heartedness and singleness of purpose. Some remarks on the subject followed, and Andrew Cadwalader and Nat Murray gave brief accounts of the Centennial Services of Miami Monthly Meeting, at Waynesville, Ohio, which a number of the Association members attended the previous week. Some time was given to the reading of reports and discussion of business, and after the reading of one of Whittier's poems by Louise Cadwalader, the meeting closed in silence.

GRACE D. HALL, Assistant Clerk.

LITERARY NOTES.

In the summer of 1902, the young author Jack London went down into the slums of Whitechapel and observed the conditions of life in that dreariest of slums. Such poverty as exists in East London goes beyond anything we have in our worst American slums. The book which this investigator made, "The People of the Abyss" (Macmillan: New York), is a vital picture of a vast population of hopeless paupers. The book would make good reading for the upper classes who are just now luxuriating on their vast estates during the hunting season. How long will society tolerate such awful extremes?

There is a very fresh and attractive quality about the essays of William B. Yeats. They have recently been collected into a volume, "Ideas of Good and Evil" (Macmillan: New York). The author is the chief figure in the Celtic Revival, which is one of the most engaging movements in contemporary letters. Both in his dreamy, mystic poems, and in his eager, intimate prose meditations, he speaks for those unworlly and spiritual ideals of which Ireland has always been the home, though so long and sadly neglected.

The ardent pleadings of the young Irish poet must be read by those who would be informed as to those new Celtic interests which are bound to vitalize the art and literature of the coming generation.

In "Ponkapog Papers," with their "alluring alliteration" of title, Thomas Bailey Aldrich devotes some choice pages to Robert Herrick. The eternal charm of the old master has long exercised its spell over the later poet. Aldrich is essentially of the school of Herrick, in his great care for faultless phrasing and delicate observation. The old vicar-poet inscribed affectionate little odes to rare Ben; so has Herrick received the devotions of Aldrich, as in this happy quatrain.—

"No slightest golden rhyme he wrote
That held not something men must quote;
Thus by design or chance did he Drop anchors to posterity."

Among the good bits in the present essay we may transcribe this: "Herrick was in spirit an Elizabethan, and had strayed by chance into an artificial and prosaic age—a sylvan singing creature alighting on an alien planet."

A certain editor of Herrick once declared in after years that he "had outgrown Herrick" since editing him. It is a comforting thing to see still among us those who can never outgrow, even in this clamorous age, the perpetual grace and single-hearted appeal of the old English singer. A genuine lover of Herrick must love him to the end!

The shorter papers in the book are lit up with abundant pleasantry and sanity. In the discourse on autograph-hunters, we are told that "Whittier used to be obliging: . . . Emerson, always philosophical, dreamily confiscated the postage stamps." (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.) J. R. H.

The issue for Tenth month of the Riverside Literature Series contains Tennyson's Gareth and Lynette, Launcelot and Elaine, and The Passing of Arthur. An earlier issue for this year contained Irving's Life of Goldsmith, with introduction and notes by Willis Boughton. This series of English and American classics is issued quarterly in paper covers. (Houghton, Mifflin & Company, New York; 15 cents single number.)

In the Atlantic Monthly President Eliot, of Harvard, discusses "The School," showing its characteristics, its aims, and into what it should develop. Brooks Adams, in "The Economic Conditions of Future Defense," takes the unfriendly ground that force is the only law among nations. Burton J. Hendrick describes the working of the new tenement law in New York and its inestimable advantages to the poor.

INDIAN SUMMER.

A soft veil dims the turquoise skies,
And half-conceals from pensive eyes
The bronzing tokens of the Fall;
A calmness broods upon the hills,
And Summer's parting dream distills
A charm of silence over all.

The stacks of corn, in brown array,
Stand waiting through the placid day,
Like tattered wigwams on the plain;
The tribes that find a shelter there
Are phantom peoples, forms of air,
And ghosts of vanished joy and pain.

At evening, when the blood-red crest
Of sunset passes through the West,
I hear the whispering host returning:
On far-off fields, by elm and oak,
I see the light, I smell the smoke,—
The camp-fires of the Past are burning.

—Henry and Tertius van Dyke, in Harper's Magazine.

SORROW.

SORROW, why from year to year,
Dost thou follow me?
I have wandered far and near
To escape from thee,
Far and near and far and wide,
Still to find thee at my side!

Long ago when knowledge came
Like a slender lad,
I had never heard thy name,
All my soul was glad,
Oh, to clasp the beautiful boy
To my heart I dreamed were joy!

Knowledge near and nearer drew,
In my strong embrace
Quick I caught him, then I knew
We were face to face,
And that pallid face of thine
Ever since hath followed mine.

Thou hast wrapped my roselike dreams
Close within the shroud,
Knowledge all uncertain seems Like a melting cloud,
Sure, insistent, somber, near,
Thou dost ever haunt me here.

Yet, O Sorrow, if at last
Thou should'st turn and go,
I, to whom thou clings't so fast,
Would not have it so,
For thou'st taught through saddened years
Patience, and the balm of tears!

HOWELL S. ENGLAND.

"Have you had a kindness shown you?
Pass it on!
'Twas not given for you alone—
Pass it on!

Let it travel down the years,
Let it stop another's tears,
Till in Heaven the deed appears,

George Cadbury's Newspaper.

LONDON has been treated to a remarkable journalistic surprise in connection with a change in the proprietorship of the Daily News of that city. The new owner immediately took the step of excluding all racing and betting news. Predictions were freely made that this policy would be disastrous, especially as the circulation of the paper was then on the down-grade. At the same time much greater attention was given to religious intelligence than by any other paper, and later all advertisements of alcoholic liquors were excluded. The result has actually been the conversion of a heavy loss into an actual profit, and at present the circulation is still increasing at the rate of 1,000 a day.—[City and State.]

CURRENT EVENTS.

THE Fifty-eighth Congress of the United States met in extra session on the 9th instant. When the roll was called seventy Senators and 350 Representatives answered to their names. Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, was elected Speaker of the House. The President's proclamation was read, stating that the special session had been called to determine whether Congress would give its approval to the reciprocal treaty with Cuba. A resolution offered by the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee was adopted, requesting the President to give to the House of Representatives "all correspondence and other official documents relating to the recent revolt in the Isthmus of Panama."

THE attempt of several well-known Southern planters to solve the negro problem by founding an experimental colony composed of Southern negroes in Liberia, Africa, nearly a year ago, has proved a failure. The first members of the party to return arrived in New York on the 6th. The party of fifty-six negroes was sent from Georgia last First month at the suggestion and with the financial aid of a company of Georgia planters headed by J. J. Henderson, of Osceola, Ga., with provisions, farm implements, seed for cotton and corn and what money they themselves possessed. It was hoped that the growing of cotton would mark the success of the venture, but the colonists were not able to make even potatoes grow there. Meanwhile the provisions were disappearing and spoiling, the natives were hostile, and in six weeks the tropical fever had appeared. In less than eight months one-half of the entire number was dead. There are still eleven negroes left in the settlement, but they are coming back in the course of three weeks.

THE United States Government has recognized the independence of the Republic of Panama and has used its authority to prevent the transportation of troops by either Colombia or Panama on the Isthmian railway; the establishment of the new government has, therefore, been unaccompanied by bloodshed. The Colombian Government has protested against the attitude of the United States forces on the Isthmus. On the 9th the Provisional Government of Panama designated a commission of three members to sail immediately to Washington to enter into negotiations for a new canal treaty.

THE Pennsylvania Congress of Mothers, over which Anna Janney Lippincott, of Philadelphia, presided, met in Scranton last week. The papers read and discussed dealt with matters pertaining to the welfare of children: the training of deaf children to talk; the special schools needed for defective, backward and incorrigible children; the beneficent influence of school cities, school gardens and juvenile courts; the condition of children among the Mormons, etc. Resolutions were adopted in favor of uniform marriage and divorce laws, and an anti-polygamy amendment to the National Constitution.

THE American Federation of Labor, on the 9th, opened in Faneuil Hall, Boston, its twenty-third annual Convention, with President Gompers in the chair.

CRITICISM.

We are all critics nowadays. It is a far easier task to pull down than to build up. A young woman was once asked: "Can you sew?" "I cannot sew," was her reply; "but I can rip up beautifully." Yes, criticism is easier than performance. The policy of "ripping up" is growing very popular. It is far less difficult a task to criticise a sermon than to deliver one. A fool can criticise the universe, but you must have an Almighty God to create it.

NAMES OF TEXTILES.

The names of fabrics are in many cases derived from the place where they were first manufactured; in others, the name is bestowed in honor of the place where it first became known to commerce, or from the materials composing its texture. Thus the name of muslin is derived from Mosul, in Asia.

Cambric comes from Cambrai; gauze from Gaza; baize from Bajaz; dimity from Damietta, and jeans from Jean.

The name damask is an abbreviation of Damascus; satin is a corruption of Zaytoon, in China.

Velvet is the Italian "vellute," wooly, and is traceable further back to the Latin vellus, a hide or pelt.

Serge comes from Xerga, the Spanish for a certain sort of blanket.

Bandana is derived from an Indian word signifying to bind or tie.

Alpaca is the name of a species of llama from whose wool the genuine fabric is woven.

Calico is named for Calicut, a town in India, where it was first printed.

Blanket bears the name of Thomas Blanket, a famous English clothier, who aided the introduction of woolens into England in the fourteenth century.

Shawl is from the Sanscrit, sala, which means floor, shawls having been first used as carpet tapestry.

"A TENDER-HEARTED maiden, in latest fashion dressed, Rebuked a wicked urchin who was bearing off a nest;
'Fie! fie! you cruel fellow! What, nest and eggs and all?'
I think I hear the mother-bird in yonder thicket call.

I think I see her pretty breast a-tremble like a leaf.
Put back the nest, you naughty boy, or she will die of grief.
'Oh, no, she won't!' the bad boy said;
'she doesn't care for that;
She doesn't mind such little things, for she is on your hat.'
—From A. K. Wells, "Rollicking Rhymes for Youngsters."

XLVIII.

THERE is nothing supernatural in the fact that evil can be overcome by good. Love is the strongest moral and spiritual force in the universe.

E. VIFONT BROWN.

From "Aspects of Quaker Truth."

THANKS.

I thank Thee, Father, for the summer-time,
The golden days of glory and delight,—
The days when the glad year is in its prime,
Warmed by Thy love, and by Thy smile made bright.

And for the peaceful armies of the flowers
That hang their banners out above the sod,
Saluting with sweet scents the passing hours,
And blessing me, I thank Thee, O my God.

I thank Thee for the melody of rills,
And for the glad bird-music in the air,
And for the echoes of the purple hills,
And children's voices at their evening prayer.

I thank Thee for the rush of mountain streams,
And for the beauty of the quiet lake,
And for the generous warmth of dancing beams,
And for a world grown happy for Thy sake.

I thank Thee for the cool, calm summer sea,
The playful ripple of the gentle waves,
And for huge billows tossing restlessly,
And for their music in the moss-lined caves.

I thank Thee for the long, sweet days of light,
And for the gloaming, with its hues sublime;

I thank Thee for past seasons of delight,
That came to me with the glad summer-time.

THE VALUE OF BIOGRAPHY.

THE Society of Friends, having no pastoral system or class of persons especially prepared or provided for the work of leadership, has great need of high individual efficiency. To provide for this need, much care has been taken concerning the life and education of its members. That the young should have good and well-guarded reading is one of the most important of these advices.

Reading often furnishes not only the companionship but also the aspirations of the reader. This is especially true for the young, whose imagination is unchecked by the vast array of year-long fact that has cooled the adult's ardor. The characters in books are persons with almost all the influence of personality. Hence the great need for the parent to place in the child's hands the books that do inspire. In this class well-chosen biography stands at the head.

Fiction is usually modified biography—sometimes it may be ennobled by the modification, but more often it is brought below the level of high-class biography. It is an extremely difficult task to make fiction true to the great facts of life and have it both interesting and inspiring. Young people need to read good fiction, but it is a mistake to allow it to entirely displace biography.

History, aiming to be true, must usually, from the necessary limitations of space and the purpose for which written, pass over the formative period of great characters and present the finished product, the great man standing, wonder-like and alone, on the unapproachable peak of Genius, rather than showing him as the result of slow, patient, unremitting every-day work and growth. Washington is presented as the astute commander of the armies of the struggling Republic, not a youth so industrious and reliable that men in high places depended upon him and entrusted him with their commissions at a time when most boys are learning their geometry; or Luther, giant like, hurls defiance at the Pope and the whole corrupt Catholic world, when, as a matter of fact, he held an academic discussion, as was the wont of men in his day and walk of life, and from discussion came conviction and slowly, step by step (as we all do grow in this life), Luther grew to be great enough to do a great work. George Fox is often shown as a rather mysterious man in a class alone, when he was really a seeker after and listener for truth, going through steps of progress and growth that are within the reach of hungry souls in all ages.

The Bible is a great book, but its very greatness sets it in a class apart and we find in it principles of conduct, moral and spiritual truths, rather than heroes for daily life. But heroes we must have. Every boy and girl has aspirations, and consciously or unconsciously they look around for some shining example to take as a model, and it is the duty of the parent, the guardian and the teacher to see that the boy and the girl have good models and plenty of them.

Unfortunately, the immediate environment does not always fill this need, and the best substitutes are often to be found in well-chosen biography. Here the author has time and space to develop the life history and show the steps by which greatness has come—to point out the path that led and yet leads to the lonely rock of genius. The youth can see that great achievement means not a wilful stroke of providence, but great effort and long preparation. For instance, Robert Louis Stevenson, the author of inimitable style, is seen as a boy with note-books in his pocket—engaged in daily, almost hourly practice in the art of writing; again, George Stephenson, the inventor, laboring at a coal-mine and developing his mathematics by chalking problems on the sides of coal carts in his moments of rest. We have of course the classic example of Lincoln, the rail splitter, learning geometry and law by the firelight after days of arduous toil; and biography in general reveals the great fact that genius has come up by the road of industry, and that the avenue to accomplishment is open to all of us.

When it comes to the more practical question of making selection of books for particular young people, there are many things to consider, and one element, without which all others are of no avail, is that the book must interest. Further it must be remembered that the books that are of interest to the father of 45 and the grandfather of 70 are not always interesting to the son or daughter aged 10 to 16.

THE HUMAN SIDE OF PREACHING.

THE thought of preparing a sermon or even of preparing one's self in a general way for the ministry has always been repugnant to Friends. Feeling that the only qualification for the ministry is the divine qualification—a life in close communion with the Eternal Spirit and a "call" to give to others a message from out of the fullness of one's own spiritual experience—they have made little account, so far as one can tell from Friends' writings or from the proceedings of the meetings of ministers and elders, of the merely technical side of preaching. And yet in all preaching there is the purely technical side. There is the intellectual, for instance. The preacher must gather together his thoughts and arrange them in more or less logical order. He must know the workings of the minds of the people to whom he is preaching and present his thoughts in such order and form as to appeal to his hearers. Then there is the side of preaching that has to do with delivery; there is the matter of voice and gesture.

Though Friends have never said much about this side of preaching, yet every minister who has preached the gospel so as to quicken in his hearers an interest in the spiritual truths that he has learned in his own experience has undoubtedly given attention to it, whether consciously or more or less unconsciously. He thinks, he reads books, he clarifies his thought by conversation. He preaches at first but little and perhaps in a scarcely audible voice. He grows in the ministry, and only gradually gains fluency and the ability to arrange his thoughts while standing before a company of people and to express them so as to be clearly and instantly understood, and in a voice that is impressive and can be heard in all parts of the house.

Just as it is right for a young minister to turn his thoughts consciously toward spiritual things, or to improve his mind by reading, so it is right that he should give attention to his own voice and learn the possibilities of it and how to use it whenever he may be called on to do so. It is very commendable for a young farmer to make a thorough study, so far as he has the opportunity, of everything pertaining to the soil of his farm, to the most approved methods and the best machinery, and to do this systematically and with thoroughness. It is even more commendable in a young minister or any member of a meeting (for no one knows who may be called into service or when), to prepare himself for public expression as thoroughly as possible, and as systematically as possible so that he can make the thought that comes to him understood by his hearers, so that he can impress them with the importance of it, and so that they may be attracted and interested.

These thoughts have been suggested by reading a little book entitled "Hints for Lay Preachers," by F. B. Meyer¹ a book that would be a very good one to take up as the beginning of a systematic study of the more human side of public speaking; or for a busy man who has but little time to give to systematic study of any kind, but yet would like to give some attention to the elements of the art of effective speaking.

The motto of the book is from William Penn,— "It's a coal from God's altar must kindle our fire; and without fire, true fire, no acceptable sacrifice." The opening words of the first chapter are these: "There is all the difference possible between delivering a sermon and uttering a message." Further on in this chapter the author says, "Our usefulness in God's service is largely affected by the question, whether we work for God, or allow God by His Spirit to speak and work through us," and further, "We have no right to deliver the divine thought in a slipshod or slovenly manner." These quotations show the point of view of the whole book.

The author believes that "it is a profound mistake to introduce [in a sermon or speech] too many divergent themes, any one of which is useful and interesting, but none stands out with such marked prominence and distinctness as to arrest the attention of the congregation"; and he devotes a chapter to this subject of keeping to one aim or purpose in a public discourse.

He holds that the true preacher "strikes at the spiritual life of men, and appeals to their conscience in the sight of God. . . . It is little for us, therefore, that men should say they are pleased with our discourses, or have enjoyed our sermons." Again, "when we are preaching under the deep impression of the Spirit's fellowship, or, as the apostle puts it, of the 'communion of the Holy Spirit,' we are almost indifferent to the presence or absence of certain people, or to the largeness or smallness of our congregation." He does not believe in gestures—"gesticulation distracts people from catching the sense of the words that are being spoken. . . . And when one is conscious that the Spirit is present, accompanying the word with signs and wonders in the hearts and lives of those present, one is apt to become more quiet, self-possessed and natural."

One chapter is entitled "Workers together with God." This thought of the high calling of the preacher is presented, and then there is the reminder that "such coöperation as this does not for a moment lead to indolence and lethargy. On the contrary it stimulates us to the highest activity."

A chapter on sermon construction begins, "In making a sermon, you must first be sure that you have a definite message. It is not that you have discovered a fantastic or striking way of treating a text of Scripture, nor that you can bring either poetry or learning to bear upon its treatment; certainly not that the hour is at hand when you must fill an engagement—none of these should be the primary cause of your making a sermon."

In the chapter on the legitimate use of Scripture in preaching we find this: "Too many preachers put their private interpretation on striking phrases of the Word of God, and make them subserve a meaning which the Spirit of God can hardly have intended. This practice is neither reverent nor wise. It is not reverent, because, surely, it is more becoming to learn what may have been the divine purpose in any passage of Scripture than to impress it to our own purpose. And it is not wise, because thoughtful men who listen feel that the Bible can be made to mean almost anything that its expositors desire, and that their method of interpretation differs widely from that to which all other books are subjected." And further on in the same chapter—"Our main end in preaching is not to bring our thoughts to the Bible, but to bring out God's thoughts before the gaze of our fellows." The chapter ends with these words, "But always recollect that you are not warranted in preaching to others that which you have not made a matter of your personal religious consciousness. Nothing so injures us as to preach beyond our own experiences and aims."

To those who are more or less learned in scholarly studies of the Bible, perhaps even in the original Hebrew and Greek, is given this word of warning, "It is not wise to needlessly obtrude the names of your authorities or your knowledge of the original languages on your audience. Give your people the results, and do not worry them with the process."

There is a chapter on reading. The author says, "There is a regular and systematic use of other men's thoughts, which should always be going on, and without which our own mind will soon become barren and unproductive. . . . It is not that we are to give them forth as we receive them, but that they shall stir our own minds to independent action, the joint product being different to what either mind would have elaborated from itself." "If you are going to preach to the same people for a succession of years—perhaps we might also say of months—you must enrich the soil of your mind and heart by taking in the suggestions and conclusions of other thinkers." The writer suggests that it is good to "have always in reading one or more thoughtful and thought-breeding books. If they are of a different school of thinking or order of mind from your own, so much the better." He warns us, wisely, "to beware of always reading theological works," and "whatever you do don't be always reading other men's sermons."

R. BARCLAY SPICER.

CHARLES THOMPSON.

[The following account of a valued English Friend, to which our attention was called by John William Graham, is taken from the Report of the Ackworth Old Scholars' Association for 1903.]

CHARLES THOMPSON (scholar at Ackworth Friends' School, 1831-3), tenth son and fifteenth child of John and Sarah Thompson, of Morland, near Penrith, was born on the ninth of Tenth month, 1819.

The family had lived in Morland for five generations. The first was John Thompson, master of a grammar school in a part of the ancient Parish Church, as witnessed by the carving on the lintel of a doorway, now placed inside the church, "Ludus Grammaticus, Johanus Thompsoni, anno 1699."

Charles Thompson was first educated under James Thompson, at the Morland Grammar School, and when twelve was sent to Ackworth. At fourteen, he was apprenticed, much against his will and inclination, to his brother John, a grocer in Liverpool. After six years he was for a time with the Martindales, ginger beer manufacturers, in Liverpool.

On the ninth of Ninth month, 1841, when twenty-two, he married Mary Quail, daughter of Edward Quail, of Liverpool, at the Public Registry Office. He at once informed the overseers of his monthly meeting. This being a new departure caused some difficulty in the discipline—for there had been no priestly interference—yet it was thought best to disown him for a breach of the Society's rule. He kept on attending meetings, and was reinstated in two years.

In 1847 he settled in Manchester, as the representative of the firm of Harrisons and Crosfield, tea merchants, London, with whom he remained till 1853. In that year he joined his friend Nathaniel Card as a cotton spinner, and continued with him several years. On the death of the latter Charles Thompson took a large part in the cause of the United Kingdom Alliance, of which they were both among the original founders in 1853. In this connection he was much engaged in attending meetings all over the country, in waiting upon candidates for Parliament, till at last he became an unsuccessful candidate himself on two occasions in the Temperance interest, at Bath and at Whitehaven. He was also a member of the Alliance executive for many years.

In 1848 Charles Thompson attended his first yearly meeting in London, and during the next fifty years he was not absent more than five times; his seat seemed always reserved for him. He was always a staunch upholder of conservative Quakerism, even in the matter of personal dress; a man of tender religious spirit, and one who sympathized with liberal thought in religious matters. He took large part in the time of the "Duncan Controversy" in Manchester Meeting when the Yearly Meeting sent down a strong committee to deliberate on the matter; he took the stand for freedom of belief and expression of opinion.

From 1860 to 1870 he was a member of the Manchester City Council, which gave him broader ideas of citizenship. He was the first to move in that Council for the opening of the Free Libraries on Sunday.

In 1864 he became associated with the National

Boiler Insurance Company, of Manchester, and was the first chairman of the Directorate, which office he held for thirty-eight years, till failing health obliged him to retire in 1902. On his eightieth birthday the directors presented him with an illuminated address of congratulation and appreciation of his business capabilities and sterling worth.

In 1870 he was appointed a magistrate for the city of Manchester, before which time no member of the Society of Friends had accepted the honor. In 1881 he was made a magistrate for the county of Westmorland, when he refused to sign one of the two declarations, which had for generations been considered obligatory; such was the effect produced that it was never again placed before anyone who took the appointment of magistrate for that county.

In 1874 he took up his residence in his native village of Morland, and sought the advance and welfare of the district, and thus endeared himself to all. In 1876 Charles Thompson, in company with his wife, paid a three months' visit to the United States and Canada.

In 1891 his golden wedding was celebrated with a gathering of the whole of the village and its outlyings, together with relatives from far and near, when a tent and tea were provided, and it proved a red-letter day in the village.

On the 21st of Second month, 1903, he died in the house he was born in eighty-three years before, in the ancestral home of five generations, the only surviving member of Morland Meeting of Friends, and the "grand old man" of the village.

A PLEA FOR MORE LIFE.

To my brethren of the smaller meetings I send my greeting: read first a portion of the 38th verse of the 6th chapter of Luke, "For with the same measure that ye mete withal it shall be measured to you again."

As we walk along your country roads the tall, straight trees, half stripped of their summer glory, stand out against the sky like battle-worn sentinels. The trees of the orchard have given their yield of luscious fruit, the grain and hay crops have been stored, and the corn is standing in shocks ready for the gleaner. We are at a resting post. Autumn is quietly gliding by; the merry song of the brook and the farewell song of many birds proclaim a harvest finished. But what of this harvest? Just in proportion as we have cared for—sprayed the trees of the orchard, in proportion as we have fertilized and worked the land, in proportion as we have cared for and fed our stock—has been our reward. As we "measured" so God "hath measured" to us again. If God then hath blessed the work of our hands, is it not time for us to endeavor to make a small return for his gifts, not only temporary gifts, but for the blessings offered through the word of inspiration, "Search the Scriptures"?

I am much concerned, my dear brethren, over the small attendance at our meetings. It is to our shame that God's light houses, set as they are upon our beautiful hill-tops, should give out such an uncertain light. It is to hope—"Hope is an essential to all true progress." "Unless we have confidence in a brighter future for the Society of Friends, we are not likely to throw our whole energy into working for it." It is to work—memories cluster around the dear old meeting-house; dear ones have gone home leaving to you the burden of the day; how faithful are you? Is it not true that you are making the farmers' club more attractive than the meetings? Clearly then you have a duty to perform. You must make your meetings more attractive, more interesting. Men and women who attend your meetings have a right to expect to hear something that will lift them up,—something that will inspire them to live better lives, something that will comfort them in sorrow, something that will bring them in touch and sympathy with their fellowman and God.

I seem to hear someone say, we are so few and so widely scattered that this cannot be done. Ruskin said "God never imposes a duty without giving the time to do it." Your loving duty, my brethren, is the care and growth of that vineyard of the Lord clustered around your meeting. Duty is something which can be moulded into well-nigh as many forms as there are men and women; as members it is best that you should mould your duty to the accomplishment of the purpose; be a unit in your work, set aside such excuses as "it is not friendly" and "our fathers did not do it that way." You are facing a need of to-day. Duty becomes a combination of desire, ability, and need; that task which most perfectly combines these three is pretty apt to be the highest duty; then do we come to a full realization of the fact that God never asks more than man can give.

Work is the genius that wins; so let me encourage you, my brother, my sister, to work earnestly; give every member something to do and in a very short time the light of God's love will be seen burning brightly, shining from every meeting house; it will lighten the road to heaven for the crowds that will attend to the duty of an active worship. "For with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured unto you again." W.

NEW TESTAMENT LESSON.—No. 43.

REVELATION (Continued).

GOLDEN TEXT.—Righteousness exalteth a nation: but sin is a reproach to any people.—Proverbs, xiv., 35.

Before study of Lesson read Revelation, xiii., 1-18; xvii., 1-18.

The book of Revelation, as stated in the last lesson, presents the struggle of the divine against the evil forces of the world, the former being represented by the Messianic kingdom, the Christ and his Church; the latter by the enemies of that kingdom, the Roman empire, the Jews and various apostate or heretical sects, all summed up in the word antichrist. Of these enemies at the time when John wrote the empire was the chief. The Jews ceased to be an important factor in persecution after the fall of Jerusalem, in 70 A. D.; and the sects were none of them strong enough to be a serious menace. But the Roman empire was antagonistic to all that the Christians stood for. It was an absolute and tyrannical despotism. There was no law above the will of the emperor. And the period between the death of Jesus and the writing of the Apocalypse was made terrible by the rule of three of the worst emperors the world has known. Caligula, who wore the purple from 37 to 41 A. D., was "a madman, insanely wicked." He reveled in the bloody sports of the arena, and when the victims were too few "he sent his servitors around and took here a man and there a woman from the audience, and flung them into the arena, that the cruel sport might still continue" (Abbott). He had victims tortured at his feast that he might enjoy "the music of their groans and tears." His successor, Claudius (41-54 A. D.), was feeble-minded, and, though he seemed well-meaning for a time, he fell under the influence of a vicious and wicked woman, who dictated his course thereafter. And Nero (54-68) has given a name to all that is base and cruel. He "was crazy with vanity, . . . sensation-mad . . . ; if he did not actually set fire to Rome, he came, when it was blazing, that he might enjoy the gorgeous spectacle of its ruin; then impaled the Christians on stakes, covered them with inflammable material, set fire to them, and let them burn that by their flames his garden might be illuminated" (Abbott). Nero himself was frequently known to the Christians as the antichrist, and the Apocalypse seems to mean by "the beast" sometimes the empire and sometimes Nero as its embodiment. It was not only the tyranny and cruelty of the empire that set it in opposition to Christianity. If it was the antithesis of brotherly kindness, so also was it at the opposite pole from that control of the passions which was an essential part of the Christian faith. Roman society was idle, luxurious and shamefully vicious. Wealth and pleasure were its gods. Money was heaped up by extortion and oppression, and spent with lavish extravagance. "Drunken orgies went on from day to day, lasting sometimes an entire week," and the companion vices of gluttony and sensuality were inexpressible. Marriage was a mere temporary agreement, to be dissolved at will. There was no general education, no religion that had any relations with right conduct. The demand that the emperor should be worshipped as a god put an end to all freedom of worship, introducing also a basis for a charge of disloyalty against all Christians.

With these facts in mind, let us turn to the imagery of Revelation. "The Beast from the sea (taken over from Daniel), with its complement of ten horns (centers of power), and its seven heads on which were 'names of blasphemy' was felt to be realized in the Roman Empire" (Bartlett). The "name of blasphemy" was, of course, the name of God as applied to the emperors (xiii., 1). One head was "smitten unto death," but was healed. This may refer to Cæsar's wound, healed in the accession of Augustus; to Caligula's illness, or, more probably, to the death of Nero, healed in the election of Vespasian (xiii., 3). The demand for Cæsar-worship is implied repeatedly (xiii., 4, 7, 8). The second beast (xiii., 11) is not so plain, but may refer to the provincial priesthood of Rome, or the Roman power in the colonies. The number of the beast (xiii., 18), which is the number of a man, is believed to be the "number" of Nero. Each letter of the Hebrew alphabet, like those of the Roman alphabet, stands for a number; and 666 is the number reached by adding the values of the letters making up the words Nero, Emperor.

In the fourteenth chapter, as again in the eighteenth, we have prediction of the fall of Rome under the symbolic name of Babylon the Great (xiv., 8; xviii., 2).

In the seventeenth chapter the imagery is changed somewhat. Rome is presented as the "scarlet woman," seated upon the beast filled with names of blasphemy, having as before seven heads and ten horns. The woman is drunk with the blood of the saints and martyrs. The seven heads are seven kings; five are fallen, one is, and one is to come. The line of five so-called Julian emperors beginning with Tiberius had come to an end in the violent death of Nero. Vespasian was now ruling; only one was lacking to make up the sacred number seven, after which the final struggle and victory might be expected. "The beast that was, and is not, is also an eighth, and is one of the seven" (xvii., 8, 11). This beast is Nero, who had already been called the antichrist by the Christian sufferers. It was believed either that he was not really dead or that he would revive for the final terrible contest; wherefore he would be an eighth, though one of the seven. The ten horns probably represent the provincial governors, who "receive authority as kings, with the beast for one hour" (xvii., 12). John expected, not without reason, that these provincials would turn upon Rome when opportunity served and destroy her (xvii., 16).

It is plainly to be seen that all this was intended for the people of John's own time, in which the apostle expected all these things to come to pass. The fact that the predictions were not fulfilled only shows what has been so often noted in these lessons, that a prophet is not a foreteller except in the sense that he reads the signs of the times. And in the case of John the assumption of the immediate advent of the Messianic kingdom rendered all of his predictions valueless. John himself lived to see that he had misunderstood. We find in his epistles, written ten or fifteen years later, no attempt to lay down a program for the future beyond a general statement that "it is the last hour." And the gospel of John, written still later, is in similar spirit.

It is most curious to reflect that a few centuries later the Christian Church, the bride of the Christ, was to enter into intimate partnership with the beast of the seven hills; a partnership fraught with a multitude of evils—and this, the greatest of all, that in so uniting the Church yielded up, wholly or in part, most of those very ideals which at the earlier days had set it in absolute antagonism to Rome.

ISAAC H. HILLBORN.

ANOTHER of our leaders has passed through the gates that open into the higher life, and many hearts are sorrowing because his familiar face and form will no longer be seen in our meetings or at our firesides. Very few members of the Society of Friends have been so active in all branches of its work as Isaac H. Hillborn, and few have shown a clearer conception of its foundation principles.

While at the head of Girard Avenue First-day School he was beloved by the children and was an inspiration alike to old and young; and there was always a feeling of disappointment when he visited some other meeting and was not in his accustomed place in the minister's gallery. He was often invited to address Friends' Associations, so that the younger members and those in attendance outside of the Society might have a better understanding of Friends' testimonies. At Yearly Meeting time he was one of the active workers in the lunch room and every one had a pleasant word for him as he stood on guard at the door. As clerk of Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting and afterwards of the Yearly Meeting he showed exceptional ability, endeavoring always to gather the sense of the meeting impartially.

But useful as he was to the Society in other capacities it is as a minister of the gospel that his loss will be most deeply felt. He expressed himself clearly and convincingly, showing that the religious life is simply a daily service of good deeds. Because of his closeness to the Father, drawing strength from Him as the branch draws its strength from the vine, he often spoke with great power, filling the hearts of his hearers with the desire to come into the same close communion. Even the children felt this influence, and the pupils of the Race Street school were deeply grieved when they learned that they would never again hear his words of counsel on Fourth-day mornings.

For more than a year he has walked in the valley of the shadow of death, fearing no evil because God was ever present with him. During his weeks of patient suffering hundreds of those who loved him, some of whom he did not even know personally, inquired concerning his condition; and while they are glad for his sake that his sufferings are over, they are mourning because they have lost a friend. The memory of his simple, kindly life and his earnest ministry will long continue to be a strengthening influence.

INTERDENOMINATIONAL WORK.

FAR more would be lost than gained by merging the great historic sects, if that were possible, into one "united church." Each has its own work to do in ministering to those to whom it alone can minister and in bearing witness to those testimonies that are its peculiar heritage.

And yet there is work in which many or all the denominations are alike interested, as temperance work, the movement for interesting young people early in the work of the church, the improvement in methods and the spread of religious education. In all these and other lines of common interest it is good for those having different methods and laying stress on different phases of truth to give one another the result of their experience.

Among the reports of conferences in our last issue was one of a County Sunday School Association held in one of our meeting-houses in Southern Indiana, and in the work of which Friends in that section are actively interested. In another State one of our smallest meetings takes an active part in the county Sunday school organization. Our Friends there, who are distant from other meetings and have not the opportunity of joining with other Friends in First-day school conferences, have been greatly strengthened by thus joining with others. They also, few though they are, have added strength to the work of their neighbors and have had a distinctively Friendly influence on it. That some of their number have been called to important offices and responsibilities in county and State work would indicate that their co-operation is felt to be helpful.

In thus joining with those of other denominations none of our testimonies need be laid aside nor weakened. Indeed if we are ignorant of the distinctive principles of our Society or timidly fail to bring them to bear in our joint work with the others we are not true to our responsibilities, and the co-operation of our Society does not mean as much in the work as it ought.

Learning of the methods and difficulties of others can be a great help to us. It is also a help to us to come to understand better their distinctive messages to the world and to learn to bring them to bear in our own lives. On the other hand we are to take our part in the joint work as Friends and to let whatever light we may have as Friends benefit those with whom we work. It is not for us to go into co-operation with others, and through ignorance, or neglect, or excessive "broad-mindedness" leave behind us the very things that alone could make our help of distinctive value.

We learn with great pleasure of the organization of a Friends' Association in Columbus, Ohio. A few Friends living in that city, one of whom is a young man in attendance at the State University, have been wishing for some time that they might come together for effective work, and they have been encouraged to do this by the Joint Committee on Isolated Members. One of this committee, a member of Ohio Yearly Meeting, was in attendance at the second meeting of the Association. The Friends at whose home the meetings are held lived for a time in Colorado Springs, and were active workers in the meeting that was then held in that city.

She was received into membership with Friends in 1867, and has since been an active worker in the Society; she was highly esteemed as a consistent Christian woman. She is survived by her aged husband (past 90) and seven children.

When a noble spirit passes from works to rewards we exclaim, "What a sad loss to us!" This death removes from Philadelphia an active worker in the cause of humanity, the bettering and uplifting of which has been her life-work, to which she unsparingly devoted her time, her energies, and deep and earnest thought. She possessed a mind of keen, fine perceptions, and of rare executive ability. And although she has but stepped off the path into the Great Mansion a little in advance of us, we, her friends, will in the remainder of the journey sincerely miss her words of encouragement, her example, and the strength and power of her superior ability.

NOTES.

The program of the General Conference to be held in Toronto next summer is nearing completion. Our friend William Greenwood Brown, of Toronto, is actively at work preparing for the Conference, and we make some extracts from a recent letter: "Last week, in company with my friend Professor Stevenson, of Stratford, I called upon Professor Goldwin Smith and met with a very cordial reception. For a man 81 years of age, Goldwin Smith does a large amount of work. He is now correcting his History of the United States and completing his volumes of reminiscences. He entered into a very interesting reference to his living among Friends in England and his intimate acquaintance with John Bright, with whom he was very much in accord, politically and religiously. He is greatly pleased with the prospect of the Conference coming to Toronto, and says he will be one of the most faithful attendants thereof, if his health permits. He readily gives consent for his name to be referred to in the program as one who will likely attend and give a short address. His remarks will doubtless be very suitable and very plain. He is known for his scholarly attainments and democratic views."

The speakers at the coming Conference will be Friends, with very few exceptions. Three or four persons, prominent in education or reform, have been asked to give addresses, which will add to the interest and value of the occasion. Among these are J. F. McCurdy, Professor of Oriental Languages and Literature in the University of Toronto, who will speak on "War and Religion"; Adam Shortt, Professor of Political and Economic Science in Queen's University, at Kingston, Ontario, who will speak on "Individuality in Spiritual and Social Life," and A. Stevenson, Master of History and Literature in Stratford Collegiate Institute, Stratford, Canada, whose topic is "The School Teacher in Relation to the Peace of the World."

More sessions than usual will be devoted to distinctly religious subjects and the first few minutes of each session will be devotional. It is earnestly hoped that an important result of the coming Conference will be the deepening of our religious life and fuller consecration to service.

Henry W. Wilbur, of New York city, addressed a meeting under the auspices of the Newtown Friends' Association at the Friends' Meeting House, Newtown, on First-day afternoon. Thomas W. Stapler, vice-president of the association, acted as chairman and introduced the speaker to a good-sized audience. The subject of his address was "The Dissemination of Friends' Principles," his theme being, that although other sects were in a large measure assimilating the most vital of Quaker beliefs, it is the Society of Friends, owing to its peculiar system, that is best calculated to promote and promulgate the fundamental principles. Other societies may recognize the inner light but they cannot institute a real democracy of worship with their present system of a formal ministry. The Friends are to-day as in the time of Fox and Barclay a unique people. Some of the peculiarities which were significant to the forefathers, have no longer the meaning that they once had and are gradually disappearing, but there is just as great need as ever for strong testimony against existing evils. The belief was expressed that Friends should throw out lines of attachment to people who are unchurched, thus becoming missionaries as in the early days in England. Meetings for worship would be more attractive if members would live up to the theory of their form of worship, namely that each individual should give as well as receive.—[Doylestown Intelligencer.]

On the sixth instant Joseph Elkinton arrived in Philadelphia from Toronto with a party of ten Doukhobors, who had been assigned to his care for their education among Friends in these parts, with a view of becoming teachers among their own people. He proceeded with them immediately from the train on which they arrived, and attended the opening exercises of Friends' Select School. Vasilii Vereschagin, who with his wife and two children were of the number, was induced to make, through their interpreter, some remarks to the assembled school, to whom he expressed their gratitude to the Society of Friends, their own attitude against war and the shedding of man's blood, and their purpose of further education. Some of these will go to Friends of Hector Monthly Meeting near Lake Cayuga, N. Y., others to homes in New Jersey and in Pennsylvania.—[Learning agriculture and domestic industries with the schooling to be found in their neighborhoods.—[The Friend, Philadelphia.]

Friends will note by reference to the Calendar of Events of Interest to Friends that the evening meeting in Philadelphia which has been held during this month at Race street is now discontinued there. It is held next First-day (the 20th) in West Philadelphia (35th street and Lancaster avenue.) During Twelfth month it will be held at Seventeenth and Girard avenue, except the last First-day in the month, when it is always held at West Philadelphia.

Two friends recently visited Camden, N. J., in search of material relating to the life of Warner Mifflin and in pursuing their investigations visited the old Motherkill Friends' Burying Ground nearby. They found the yard overgrown with grass and weeds and the fence broken and in some places missing. Before leaving Camden they arranged to pay for a substantial new fence around the yard.

A Friend of Grampian, Pa., writes: "We have just held our Quarterly Meeting [Centre, in the limits of Baltimore Yearly Meeting], which was a season of profit and enjoyment. Isaac Wilson, of Canada, was present, and the full meeting-house on all occasions attested the interested and inquiring minds."

Lydia Bean Cox, a daughter of Joel Bean, having come from California to place a daughter in Westtown School, is acceptably visiting Friends in these parts.—[The Friend, Philadelphia.]

A NUMBER of men from Coosa Co., Ala., pleaded guilty in the United States Court on the 10th to peonage and were fined $1000. With these convictions the peonage cases have about disappeared from the dockets, and the practice is said to have been completely broken up by Judge Jones.

THE OPENING OF LANSDOWNE MEETING HOUSE.

SEVERAL Friends' meeting-houses have been built within the last two years, but all of the others were for the better accommodation of long-established meetings; the house at Lansdowne, Pa., is for a meeting that had its beginning with a little First-day school four or five years ago. An account of its growth was published in the INTELLIGENCER at the time the corner-stone of its new building was laid.

As the meeting began with a First-day school and one-third of its members are minors it is fitting that its house should have been planned with especial reference to the needs of the school. The exterior of the new building, as the accompanying illustration shows, looks more like a large private dwelling than the traditional Friends' meeting-house. The front doors open into a hall on one side of which is a large class-room and on the other side a smaller class-room and the library. A stairway leads up to three more class-rooms that are directly over these. There are windows of opaque glass between the class-rooms and the meeting-room, which can be opened or closed at pleasure. The hall leads to the main room, which is two stories in height and is large enough to seat two hundred people comfortably. There are two seats facing the meeting, one of which is raised, with a railing in front.

A basement extends under the whole house, the main part of which has a board floor. When this is completed it will contain, in addition to the coal room, a dining-room, kitchen and toilet-rooms. The building is heated by two hot-air furnaces.

The opening exercises were held on Seventh-day evening, the 21st. Extra seats and chairs were placed in class-rooms and aisles and about 400 persons were present, there being many visitors from a distance. After the opening silence J. Eugene Baker, who presided during the evening, offered from a full heart a prayer of thanksgiving; he asked that all might feel a sense of their stewardship and that not only the house, but those who met within it might be dedicated to the service of God. After another silence he read extracts from two thanksgiving psalms, and in an introductory address he said that the greatest gain to the meeting in the new house was not in material things.

Lucy Biddle Lewis, in a brief paper, spoke of the unity that exists among the members and the earnestness with which they have worked together, animated by a common purpose; she also extended hearty thanks to the many Friends who have contributed to the building of the new house. The senior class of the First-day school, taught by Frank Maris, then recited Bryant's poem, "The House of God."

The main address of the evening was delivered by Henry W. Wilbur, of New York, who spoke of the essentials of a religious life and the broadness of the faith of Friends. Other speakers were John J. Cornell, Lydia H. Price, David Ferris and Samuel Jones. Joel Borton alluded feelingly to the shadow of grief that rested upon all hearts because one who had worked most earnestly for the new meeting-house was not present in the flesh to witness its completion, and Benjamin Hallowell recited an original poem in memory of Herbert S. Cloud; both of these speakers expressed the conviction that his short life, lived so faithfully, is still inspiring other lives.

Many of the visitors remained over night, and attended meeting and First-day school next morning. The general exercises of the school took the form of a thanksgiving service. The young people's Bible class, taught by J. Eugene Baker, recited a hymn of Whittier's, written for the dedication of a place of worship.

The attendance at the meeting was not quite so

Rock Creek, was donated by Jonathan Shoemaker, then a prominent member of the Society, and this is still held by trustees. In this little graveyard are interred members of the Seaver, Shoemaker, Schofield, McPherson, and Janney families. Few stones mark their last resting place, and although it has been disused as a burying place since about 1860, it has been cared for and kept fenced in.

In the same year a preparative meeting was commenced, and it was then decided to purchase ground on which to build a meeting-house. This was accomplished in 1808, and the beautiful lot on I street, between Eighteenth and Nineteenth streets, was large as on the previous evening. John J. Cornell spoke with great power for half an hour, after which there were sermons by David Ferris, Joseph Powell and Hannah Thompson, and a very impressive prayer by Henry W. Wilbur.

THE MEETING OF FRIENDS IN WASHINGTON, D. C.

[Our Friend Warwick P. Miller, of Sandy Spring, Md., called our attention to the following, which appeared on Tenth month 24th, in the Washington Post.]

WHEN the government was transferred to Washington from Philadelphia quite a number of Friends came with it, and the first committee in charge of these Friends was appointed in 1802 by the Indian Spring Monthly Meeting, near Laurel, Md., now extinct, and near the close of that year this committee reported in favor of establishing a meeting in Washington. Accordingly, in 1803, the Washington Meeting was organized.

The interest thus created continued to grow until 1806, when a mid-week meeting was established under the direction of the Baltimore Yearly Meeting. In 1807 a lot for burial purposes, situated in the rear of Cincinnati street, between Adams' Mill road and decided by one Monroe to William Morgan and others, trustees.

In 1815 the preparative meeting requested to be united to the Alexandria Monthly Meeting, which was not granted until 1817. At this time the actual members numbered forty-three, though the meetings were largely attended by others, especially during the ministry of Thomas Wetherald (from 1822 to 1829), the house being generally crowded, but after his removal to York, Pa., the meeting commenced to decline and only the members attended.

This eloquent and beloved Friend departed this life May 1st, 1832, in the forty-second year of his age. The following tribute was written to his memory by a friend: "As a preacher of the everlasting gospel, his doctrines were pure and chaste, always rising superior to sectarian dogma, and wholly rejecting the pageantry of useless tradition. As an orator he was, indeed, nature's legitimate son, with an eloquence as copious as it was lofty and mellifluous; an imagery as lovely as it was comprehensive, and a diction as chaste as it was majestic. He ravished the ear while he was leading captive the heart. As a father, a husband, and a brother, his interesting family have to lament a bereavement of no ordinary cast. As the poor man's friend and benefactor, his generosity knew no bounds. In short, in all the relations of life he was conspicuous for every virtue which should adorn the Christian."

The property was then under the care of Daniel Kurtz and others, who received it from William Morgan and others, and in time they transferred it to George Shoemaker and others, who in 1850, transferred it to Henry Janney and others, who recently transferred it to Bernard T. Janney, Thomas Sidwell, and others, in whose names the property is now held. In 1835 the mid-week meeting was transferred to Georgetown and again in 1836 it was returned to Washington. In 1849 the preparative meeting was discontinued and the members were connected with the Alexandria meeting.

The names of some of those who have been prominent in times past are: Jonathan Shoemaker, William Morgan, Dr. John Litle, Arnold Boone, Jonathan Seaver, Dr. J. Riley, William Tyson, George Shoemaker, Levi Davis, Dr. Samuel E. Tyson, Henry Janney, and Edward Shoemaker, the last of whom is still living.

On September 29th, 1879, the Friends commenced demolishing the old meeting house on I street, preparatory to building the new one, which was completed in March, 1880.

The Friends have no paid ministry, in accordance with the precept: "Freely ye have received, freely give," Matt. x., 8, but each meeting usually has several ministers who feel that they have been divinely called to preach. The time and occasion for them to preach is left to their own decision, and it frequently happens that meetings are held in absolute silence. When ministers feel called upon to travel from one meeting to another, they are supplied with the necessary means, and in the case of those who feel called upon to devote such a large part of their time to ministerial service as to deprive them of the opportunity of gaining a livelihood, the meeting makes it possible for them to follow their vocation exclusively.

Any one is allowed to speak in a meeting, and if he or she continues to speak acceptably, such a person may, by vote of the elders, become an accepted minister. Among this number in Washington are Miss Sarah Matthews and Mrs. Tacy Branson. Three of the best-known of the visiting ministers are Isaac T. Wilson, of Ontario, Canada; John J. Cornell, and Dr. O. E. Janney, of Baltimore, Md. These gentlemen speak acceptably and always attract large numbers to hear them.

The Washington meeting conducted several free kindergartens in this city for a number of years, until the board of education established public kindergartens about two years ago, when the Friends' was discontinued. The Friends' Select School, of which Mr. Thomas W. Sidwell is the principal, is conducted under the patronage of the meeting, although children of all religious denominations are counted in the attendance. Two of the predominating characteristics of Friends' are taking care of their poor and educating their children without dependence upon municipal institutions

TEMPERANCE AT WASHINGTON.

THE second bill introduced in the House this session was by Representative Bartholdt of Missouri for the repeal of the anti-canteen law. The general feeling seems to be that there is no likelihood of its going through, unless, indeed, it be done while those interested in keeping liquors out of the army posts are not watching. Edwin C. Dinwiddie, Legislative Superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League writes: "I am fairly safe in saying that with continued watchfulness we shall be able to hold the present law. This feeling by Congress is from two different standpoints; first, Congress with the country believes that the present law has not had a fair test—the recreation buildings are not yet in operation and not fully provided for—and the Department and officers have not helped to give the anti-canteen law and regime an honest trial; second, it believes to revive that question now, especially upon the eve of a presidential election, would be a political mistake."

Of especial interest is the announcement that another $500,000 are practically assured for recreation buildings for the soldiers to take the place of the abolished canteens. This will bring the total sum up to a million and a half in all. We ought not as temperance people to lose sight of the importance of this constructive work. It is not enough in the army nor anywhere to get rid of the drinking places unless means are provided for furnishing the social and other legitimate features of the public meeting place.

On the 10th Representative Hobburn, of Iowa, in the House, and the next day Senator Dooliver of the same State, in the Senate, introduced the following important bill:

Be it enacted etc., That all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any State or Territory for delivery therein, or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon arrival within the boundary of such State or Territory, before and after delivery, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquors or liquids had been produced in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise.

Sec. 2. That all corporations and persons engaged in inter-state commerce shall, as to any shipment or transportation of fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids, be subject to all laws and police regulations with reference to such liquors or liquids, or the shipment or the transportation thereof, of the State in which the place of destination is situated, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of such liquors or liquids being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise; but nothing in this Act shall be construed to authorize a State to control or in any wise interfere with the transportation of liquors intended for shipment entirely through such a State and not intended for delivery therein.

All who wish to keep posted on all that is going on at the Capitol of especial interest to temperance workers may do so by keeping in touch with the Anti-Saloon League Headquarters (31 Bliss Building, Washington, D. C.)

Harper's Weekly has an editorial on the violation by some members of Congress, of the law against the selling of liquors in the House of Representative restaurant. "It is a matter," says the writer, "which a few people take jocularly,"—"the matter of sneakingly ordering a drink of whiskey in a tea cup, for instance. "As a matter of fact," he continues, "the question is not as to whether liquor should or should not be sold in the Capitol. The root of the matter is quite different; the question is whether or not the Representatives are going to keep their word to the people of the country, who do not like to think that liquor, beer, or wines are sold in the national House of Representatives. Are members of Congress honest gentlemen, or are they surreptitious tippers? This is the point at issue. It has sometimes been suspected by the well informed that Congress has been fooling the temperance element in their constituencies for the purpose of getting their notes. Now it is for members, and Senators, too, to say whether or not this is a just suspicion. They have surrendered to an attack on the army canteen, which many believe to be, on the whole, a salubrious institution, especially if it be permitted to sell only light wines and beer. Congress, however, took the view of the extreme temperance people, or total abstainers, and excluded wines and beers from the canteens. There has been a great deal of complaint from officers and men, but Congress has remained firm; it has gone with the total abstinence people, and the soldiers cannot have wine and beer on their posts because the law of Congress is enforced by army officers.

"Congress has also joined the total abstainers on the question of wine, beer, and liquor selling in the restaurants of the Capitol. But here there has been double-dealing. The law as to the canteen is expected to be enforced. The rule as to liquor-selling at the Capitol is made to satisfy 'clamor' and is to be evaded."

EDUCATIONAL.

THE WORK AT TUSKEGEE.

BOOKER T. WASHINGTON, in his annual report to the Trustees of the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute, says that the enrollment last year was 1550 students, with an average attendance of 1441. Among these are 49 students from eleven foreign countries, most of whom were attracted by the industrial training. Both Porto Rico and Hayti support a number of students there, and 34 states and territories were represented in their enrollment, but the bulk of the students came from the Gulf states.

Thirty-six industries are taught in the school, the main emphasis being now laid upon agriculture, as the great majority of the negroes in America depend upon cultivating the soil for their living. The students now cultivate 900 acres of land.

Friends of the school often express disappointment that it is not able to supply all demands for help in homes and on farms; the school makes no attempt to do this; its purpose is to train men and women as industrial teachers and workers, who will go out as leaders and prepare others for such service. One graduate has established a training school for house service in Atlanta, another is teaching farming to fifty students in Louisiana, etc.

The more intelligent negroes are inclined to leave the farms and go to the cities, because in the cities there are comfortable school-houses and schools in session eight months in the year. For financial reasons, if for no other, it would therefore pay those who own land in the South to see to it that a good school is kept open in every country district.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE.

Fifth-day morning, 19th inst., W. L. Price of Rose Valley Settlement lectured on Arts and Crafts. His lecture was full of valuable economic arguments. Deploring the circumstances of the day which tend to make a man unskilled and merely an automaton he illustrated the work of the Rose Valley Settlement and its value.

Sixth-day, Eleventh month 20th, Eunomian literary society held its regular meeting. An excellent article on "The Canadian Annexation Question," was read by P. Seaman, after which Parliamentary drills were taken up. The meeting was a good strong one and shows what energetic young men can do. In the evening, Somerville held its regular meeting, the exercises were very entertaining.

First-day, Eleventh month 22d, the Bible class took up the question of betting and discussed it thoroughly condemning it in the most decided manner. Dean Bond read a paper before the students assembled for meeting. President Swain spoke at Langhorne Young Friends' Association on Sixth-day evening.

The Historico-Political conference was held Third-day evening. It was a success in every sense of the word.

Prof. Hayes gave his lecture "Irish Poetry and Song," at the New Century Club, West Chester, Pa., on the 16th inst.

Three members of the faculty offer lectures for literary clubs, schools, etc., as follows:

Prof. Benjamin F. Battin: College Life at Home and Abroad, Goethe, Schiller, Dante, Along the Rhine, Weimar, Modern Germany, A wheel through Europe, A foot in Hellas, Oberammergau Passion Play, Music of the Birds.

Prof. Paul M. Pearson: Riley, Field, Dunbar, Harris, Bret Harte, Mark Twain, Longfellow, Lowell, Poe, Kipling, Dickens, Tennyson.

Prof. John Russell Hayes: Readings from Chaucer, Readings from Spenser, Sir Philip Sidney: Hero and Poet, Music in Shakespeare and Browning, Robert Herrick and Other Cavalier Poets, George Herbert and Other Saintry Poets, The Songs of Burns, William and Dorothy Wordsworth, Charles and Mary Lamb, Lewis Carroll and Other Recent Humorists, The English Poets at Oxford and Cambridge, Irish Poetry and Song, The Poets of Country Life, Three Quaker Writers, Some Familiar Myths, Fairy-tale and Folk-lore, Some Contemporary Poets.

GEORGE SCHOOL.

A regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association was held Eleventh month 21st, at which the following program was given: singing, "Lead, Kindly Light"; sketch, "Life of George Fox," Paul Satterthwaite; sketch, "Life of William Penn," James Green; recitation, "A Sermon for Young Folks," Harlan Forbes; paper, "What George Fox has done for the World," Mariana Parker; singing, "Nearer, My God, to Thee"; paper, "What William Penn has done for the World," Rachel Heacock; paper, "Which was the greater man, George Fox or William Penn?" Edwin Maule; remarks, Dr. Joseph S. Walton, Mary Shoemaker, Franklin Packer; recitation, "The Second Trial," Mary Gatchell; singing, "How Firm a Foundation." All of the exercises were very interesting. Edwin Maule, in summing up the work of Penn and Fox, said, "George Fox was great because he brought the principles of Friends before the world and built up a great society. Penn was great because he applied these principles in a practical manner and showed the world that the doctrines of the Quakers were not idle dreams. Great honor is due each; each was great in the work he did, but we cannot say which one was greater, for the work of both was necessary that Friends should be a vital power for the betterment of the world."

Eleventh month 14th, the Whittier Literary Society held a regular meeting. The following program was given: reading, "Co-Education in Colleges," Richard Murfit; recitation, "Aunt Melissy on Boys," William Jenkins; essay, "The Biennherhasset," Margaretta Packer; reading, "Taming an Alligator," Thornton Conrow; recitation, "Papa and the Boy," Alice Hicks; "The Whittier Greenleaf," Thomas Clement; two short scenes from "Little Women."

On First-day evening, Eleventh month 22d, a religious meeting, composed of visitors, teachers and students, was held in the assembly-room, and our friend, John J. Cornell, spoke very impressively on the subject of "Religion."

A large picture—a Braun carbon photograph of the Coliseum—has been presented to the school in memory of Professor Charles Miller Stabler, by his George School friends, teachers and students.

YOUNG FRIENDS' ASSOCIATIONS.

CHESTER, PA.—The regular meeting of the Chester Friends' Association was held Eleventh month 13th, in the Meeting-house, Market St., below Third St. After a short silence a portion of proverbs was read by Laura C. James. Charles Palmer then read a short paper on the "Friend in the business world." He thinks that when Friends enter the business world and are so successful as to become widely known they are almost invariably spoken of as men of good repute and the productions of their business are of a kind to be relied upon. It is to be regretted, however, that the too intense application to business pursuits is continued with diminishing attention to things of the higher life. A persistent and undivided attention to business alone is death to the spiritual life.

In the absence of the paper on current events the members decided to make a few remarks on events of note in which they had been interested. This proved very satisfactory and produced a lively discussion on many topics. Eliza L. Dutton then read the 11th chapter of the "Quaker Ideal" by Francis Frith, the many helpful thoughts in it being most impressive. A poem entitled "Thoughts," by Ella Wheeler Wilcox, was read by Katharine M. Stevenson and after a short silence the meeting adjourned.

K. M. S.

HOPEWELL, VA.—The Young Friends' Association met Eleventh month 22d, 1903. The President opened the meeting by reading the 23d Psalm, after which the roll was called, and minutes read and approved. E. Caroline Branson read the chapter Education, from Friends' Discipline, William E. Branson gave an interesting collection of Current Events.

Charles E. Clevenger read an article he had written on "How can Friends best co-operate with other religious denominations to lessen the drink evil?" His concluding remarks were: "The best way to prove our love of God is by showing our love of man. How can we better do this than by fully consecrating our lives to the eradication of the worst enemy of the home, the church, and our native land? To this end let us heartily co-operate with every Church, League, or Society that is working for the same goal."

Our delegate, Daniel W. Lupton gave a most interesting description of the General Conference of the Young Friends' Association held at Wilmington, Delaware, Eleventh month 14th, 1903.

After a brief silence the Association adjourned to meet again Twelfth month 27th, 1903.

BERTHA B. CLEVENGER, Sec.

WOODLAWN, VA.—The Eleventh month meeting of the Woodlawn Young Friends' Association, held at the home of Warrington Gillingham, was well attended, and proved to be very interesting. After the customary Scripture reading and reading of the minutes Reuben K. Gillingham read a most interesting sketch of Benjamin Hallowell, which called forth many comments. "The Views and Testimonies of Friends," by Isaac Hillborn, was then read by Ellen Lukens, and this was followed by some discussion. Sarah Anthony read that beautiful poem, Whittier's "Eternal Goodness," after which George Gillingham read a short selection entitled, "True Giving." Roll-call was responded to with sentiments and Lida Gillingham continued the reading of the Penns and Penningtons. This book has been found very interesting and instructive, as it gives a good idea of the early history of the Friends. After some discussion as to the aims and work of the Association, the meeting was adjourned, to be held on the 29th instant at Walnut Hill.

LIDA W. GILLINGHAM, Sec.

COLUMBUS, O.—On First-day, Eleventh month 8th, a few Friends gathered at the home of John E. Carpenter, 2018 North High street, with the thought of organizing a Friends' Association. Ten were present and much interest was manifested. The general expression showed a great desire for future gatherings. It was decided to meet the first First-day of each month. John E. Carpenter was appointed chairman, Margaret Stanton, secretary, and James McGrew, Isaac Butterworth, Charles Burleigh Galbreath and William R. Kersey to serve on the executive committee. The secretary, whose address is 23 E. Maynard street, will be glad to hear of other Friends, or those interested in Friends, who live in Columbus or vicinity.

A second meeting was held at the same place, Eleventh month 15th, at which seventeen were present, all of this city except Anna B. Walker, of Emerson, Ohio. Isaac Butterworth and Isaac Stanton read papers full of interest, on the "History of Early Friends." It was felt they were especially instructive. An interesting discussion followed, which was taken part in by nearly every one present. Many in attendance have seldom had the privilege of attending Friends gatherings, yet through all the years of their lives have kept the faith of their parents. With a feeling of strength that comes from a higher power than that given by man, we hope to still continue to hold our meetings, trusting for Divine assistance from the Unseen Power.

A FRIEND.

MOORESTOWN, N. J.—The regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association was held in Friends' Meeting-house on Eleventh month 13th, 1903. The program for the evening was a talk on the Philippine Islands by Professor John G. Embree. He said that in coming years the Pacific Ocean would lead the Atlantic, and the Philippines would play no meagre part in the field of action. The islands are rich in verdure and have forests of the greatest value. There are many different races of Filipinos, most of them being Catholics with exception of one race, which is Mohammedan. The report of the cruelty of the Americans toward the natives is untrue, and the latter inflict more suffering on the home people than do the men of the army. The races are divided into two classes, Insurrectos or those who rise against the American people, and Ladrones, or bands of robbers who inflict suffering on their own people. Physically the Filipino is small, rather weak, clean in his way, and while he is most kind to children he is cruel to animals. The rivers are too swift for navigation, and the buffalo is used on land as the beast of burden. Professor Embree was in the islands for several months and the talk was most interesting.

ANNA B. DUDLEY, Secretary.

LITERARY NOTES.

St. Nicholas, beloved of children for thirty years, promises to be, in 1904, better than ever—if that can be. A story of adventure and fairies and romance written by the late B. L. Farjeon, "A Comedy in Wax," will run through several numbers. Other stories will be by Ruth McEnery Stuart, Bertha Runkle, Cyrus Townsend Brady, Joaquin Miller, Gabrielle E. Jackson, Elliott Flower, Grace MacGowan Cooke, Frank R. Stockton, Albert Bigelow Paine, Julian Ralph, Laura E. Richards, Tudor Jenks, Margaret Vandegrift, Howard Pyle, Charles F. Lummis.

Some of the illustrated articles will tell of Japanese athletics for American boys, interesting signs of old London, children in the White House, how some animals sleep, secret alphabets, diving for pearls, historic dwarfs.

Every reader of St. Nicholas may without any payment of dues become a member of the St. Nicholas League, which encourages prose and verse composition, artistic photograph making, and other things by competitions. Some of the best efforts are published in every number. All members must be under eighteen.

The Department of Nature and Science stimulates a keenness of observation and a love for nature that is shown by the interesting letters sent in by St. Nicholas readers from all over the world. A few of these letters are printed each month and there are special articles and pictures appropriate to the time of year.

Another department is "Books and Reading," with talks on reading and the choice of books.

Those who wish to give St. Nicholas as a Christmas gift will be given a handsome certificate of subscription to be presented on Christmas day.

Sir Walter Scott said he could read Spenser forever; and Lowell and other fine spirits have paid fealty to the great poet in affectionate terms. For the complete works of Spenser one has heretofore had to go to Dr. Grosart's stately edition. The prose-tracts on Ireland, "that savage nation," and the curious letters to Gabriel Harvey, have not been readily accessible; but they throw light on the character of a poet whose personality we know but scantily. In a choice one-volume edition of 900 pages, by employing thin paper, the publishers (T. Y. Crowell & Company, New York), have issued all that Spenser wrote,—the "Faerie Queene," the shorter poems, and the prose. Professor Trent, of Columbia University, writes the introduction; and though we must still go to Lowell's long essay for full and satisfying discussion of Spenser, the present essay contains some excellent criticism, as in this passage: "No idealist, no sensitive lover of ethereal beauty, no reader endowed with an ear trained to delight in the subtlest melodies and most exquisite harmonies, no dreamer enamored of the stately and romantic past . . . above all, no soul in love with essential purity, can possibly remain indifferent to the appeal made by the poet . . . to know Spenser at all thoroughly is to love him deeply."

Now, Quakers are in love with purity; but they have too much neglected the harmony and beauty of things. A course of deliberate, thoughtful reading in the "Fairie Queene" would be a tonic for many of us.

The same firm (T. Y. Crowell & Co.) are issuing Shakespeare in his original form. Chaucer and Spenser have always been thus printed, but Shakespeare has suffered modernization. In these pleasant little volumes, one for each play and fully annotated, one can enjoy Shakespeare in the quaint spelling of the past's own day; and though the matter of spelling may seem at first thought unimportant, yet it is the archaic look of Chaucer's and Spenser's words that gives added zest and flavor to their pages. The editors are Charlotte Porter and Helen A. Clarke, whose edition of Browning is already a kind of classic.

Many who read and found beauty and help in Earnest Crosby's "Plain Talk in Psalm and Parable"—those "prophet chants" which are a "noble protest against the wrongs and failures of civilization"—will be interested in the English paper-cover edition which is now to be had in this country (Comrade Co-operative Co., 11 Cooper Square, N. Y., 40 cents post paid). This is no cheap edition for it is the kind of blue-backed, paper-covered volumes artistically printed that is a pleasure to have about one, such as they have a knack of making on the other side of the water. As to the contents, one who has yet to make the acquaintance of this poet-philanthropist may get his attitude from this:

"It is not I that have written;

It is not I that have sung.

I'm the chord that Another has smitten,—

The chime that another has rung."

or this that has become familiar;

"No one could tell me where my Soul might be.

I searched for God but God eluded me.

I sought my Brother out, and found all three."

R. B. S.

The Century for 1904 will have as one of the notable features of the year Dr. S. Weir Mitchell's "The Youth of Washington," told in the form of an autobiography. It will be written as if by Washington, sitting down in his old age and recording, solely for his own eye, the story of his youthful life.

There will be a series of articles on "Italian Villas and their Gardens," by Edith Wharton and illustrated by Maxfield Parrish. Ernest Thompson Seton will have "Fable and Woodmyth," brief papers, illustrated by the author. John Burroughs too will appear in "Current Misconceptions in Natural History."

The Thackeray letters, telling the story of the novelist's friendship with the Baxter family, have already begun; and there will be further contributions by Ray Stannard Baker whose articles on the Great Northwest and the Great Southwest have introduced him to readers of the Century. Jacob A. Riis is also among the contributors.

The Youth's Companion is truly "a family paper," for, excepting the baby in its mother's arms, no member of the family is too young or too old to enjoy it. The very little ones find pleasure in the children's page and the pictures; the boys and girls read the stories which, though sometimes exciting, are always clean and wholesome, and enjoy the attractive bits of biography, history and science; and the old folks read the well-written summary of the world's doings, and glance over a story now and then for the sake of their childhood's days. The advertising pages are just as clean as the literary columns, for alcoholic liquors, tobacco, patent medicines, and get-rich-quick schemes are rigorously excluded.

It is published weekly by the Perry Mason Co., Boston,

Mass., for $1.75 a year, and may be ordered at that price with the FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER. New subscribers will receive the remaining issues of this year in addition to all of next year.

"Aspects of Quaker Truth," a paper-backed volume of 112 pages, price one shilling, contains four addresses by E. Vipont Brown, M. D. The first address, on "Quakerism, as Taught by George Fox," the author says was drawn largely from George Fox's Journal. For some of the thoughts contained in "The Light Within," he expresses his indebtedness to Professor Moulton and John William Graham. Dymond's "Essay on War," furnished most of the material for the third address, "Christianity and War." The last article, "The Atonement," expresses very clearly and convincingly the belief of most of the readers of FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER on that subject.

In his essay, "The Note of Gladness," in the current number of The Literary World, Bliss Carman says:

"Of all the good gifts which ever came out of the wallet of the Fairy Godmother, the gift of natural gladness is the greatest and best. It is to the soul what health is to the body, what sanity is to the mind, the test of normality. The most fortunate of mortals are those whom Nature has endowed with a wholesome power of assimilating life, just as she endows her field-bred children with a good digestion. A quick and ready appetite for life, a capacity for smiling contentment, and a glad willingness are the great things—these and courage."

Those who enjoy literary allusion mingled with playful wit will welcome Samuel M. Crothers's essays entitled "The Gentle Reader" (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.) Some of the papers first appeared in the Atlantic Monthly. They are pleasant rambles through the forests of literature, and carry one along happily and humorously. The essayist is of the genial school of Charles Lamb, Lowell, and Donald Mitchell.

LATE AUTUMN.

SKIES have lost their summer hue,

Leaden clouds are sailing,

Glittering frost instead of dew,

Wintry winds are wailing.

Gone the butterfly, the bee

Is droning till high noon,

Morning's sun a laggard he

And day declines too soon.

Gold and crimson leaves are brown,

Grasses dead and dying.

Scant the flowers in nature's crown

E'en the birds are flying

To a sunny southern shore.

Woodland nuts are falling,

Squirrels haste to take their store,

Crows in lorn tones calling

Mourn the harvest lately reaped.

The brooklet's sheltered cove

Many forest leaves has steeped,

That eddied in the grove.

Fair Pomona reigns no more

The orchard's rosy queen.

Rich Bacchante's purple store

Is as it'er had been.

Is this Autumn, aye, in truth

With her glory faded.

Now her gorgeoussness her youth

Sober hues have shaded.

All of verdure, beauty, bloom,

But a dying ember,

Nature's brightness finds a tomb

In the drear November.

Did Penn Write the "Fruits of Solitude" ?

PENNSYLVANIANS will be interested in a note contributed by Edmund Gosse to the London Athenaeum. It has lately been said that though that very popular little book, the "Fruits of Solitude," is confidently attributed to William Penn, there is no external evidence of his authorship. This evidence Mr. Gosse produces in an extract from an unpublished letter, written in 1699 by Lady Rodes, widow of Sir Francis Rodes, to her son, then staying with Henry Goldney in London. All these people, Mr. Gosse says, were in "the inner circle of Quakerdom." Lady Rodes writes:

"I desire thee to buy me 6 books of W. Pen's ye fruits of solitude, I wd have unbound for cheapness, & 2 bound, for I thinke ym Excellent Pithy books & may do good to be sent abroad; in all eight. . . . I desire thee to let me know wth yu thinks of coming home & how yu likes London in winter & also I desire to know if yu enjoy W. Penn's company sometimes & how he does & rem^r my kind respects to him."

The Rodeses were familiar friends of Penn, from whom there are several letters among the family papers. Sir John, to whom the letter above quoted was addressed, became the owner of the original manuscript of Penn's "Advice to His Children," to which he wrote a preface. Lady Rodes's attribution of the "Fruits of Solitude" to her friend may thus be accepted as final.—[Philadelphia Ledger.]

CURRENT EVENTS.

THE Cuban Reciprocity bill passed the House of Representatives on the 10th, by a vote of 335 to 21. The provisions of the bill are in brief, that the President shall proclaim the treaty in effect ten days after exchange of ratification; that during the life of the treaty, all Cuban imports now free, shall remain free; that all imports paying duty shall have a reduction of 20 per cent.; that such duties shall be preferential; that no greater reduction than 20 per cent. shall be made upon Cuban sugar; that no reduction from existing duties shall be made on sugar from any other country.

SENATOR GEORGE F. HOAR'S "Autobiography of Seventy Years," was issued on the 20th by Charles Scribner's Sons. The two good-sized volumes are a notable contribution to the political history of the country, giving, as they do, the story of a long and distinguished career, and recollections of times and men from Edward Everett and the early days in Concord, the War, Charles Sumner, the reconstruction time, to Blain and McKinley and the Spanish War.

THE National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, in its convention at Cincinnati, pointed out errors in the report of the Committee of Fifty in regard to the teaching of physiology in the schools. Resolutions were adopted, urging the Mayor and City Council of St. Louis to make special efforts, during the time of the World's Fair, to enforce the laws of the city against houses used for immoral purposes; asking the exclusion of Reed Smoot from the United States Senate, on the ground that his highest allegiance is given to a government other than that of the United States; and authorizing the President and Secretary to memorialize Congress for an anti-polygamy amendment to the United States Constitution. The Union Signal and Monthly Crusader are now the property of the national organization, and Cornelia Jewett, of Chicago, was appointed managing editor of the former. The sum of $5,000 was appropriated for an exhibit at the World's Fair. The general officers were re-elected. The place of next meeting was not decided.

THE American Federation of Labor, in session last week in Boston, decided by a vote of 11,282 to 2,185 against placing itself on record as favoring socialism. A resolution was unanimously adopted in favor of the union shop everywhere, in Federal, State and municipal employment, as well as in private enterprise, and President Roosevelt was asked to examine the testimony in the case of Wm. A. Miller, who was re-instated in the Government printing-office after being expelled from the Union. Samuel Gompers was re-elected president of the organization.

PETITIONS have been pouring into the Senate from all directions asking for the unseating of Senator Reed Smoot.

THE OLD RELIABLE

Absolutely Pure
THERE IS NO SUBSTITUTE

The National Congress of Mothers has issued an invitation to the presidents of national, state and local organizations of women, and representatives of every church in the United States to meet at the New Willard Hotel, Washington, Twelfth month 3d, at 10 a. m., for an organized effort to prevent his retention in the United States Senate. They oppose him on the ground that he owes allegiance to a hierarchy and can only hold his political position through its consent; and that he is an apostle in a church which embodies polygamy in its tenets and makes marriage essential to a woman's salvation. Senator Smoot declares that he does not favor polygamy and that the Mormon Church is loyal to the Government.

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD'S WINTER EXCURSION ROUTE BOOK.

In pursuance of its annual custom, the Passenger Department of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company has just issued an attractive and comprehensive book descriptive of the leading Winter resorts of the East and South, and giving the rates and various routes and combinations of routes of travel. Like all the publications of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, this "Winter Excursion Book" is a model of typographical and pictorial work. It is bound in a handsome and artistic cover in colors, and contains much valuable information for Winter tourists and travelers in general. It can be had free of charge at the principal ticket offices of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, or will be sent post-paid upon application to Geo. W. Boyd, General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

OLD Uncle Ben wanted to have his portrait painted, but he did not care to pay very much for it.

"Surely that is a very large sum," he said when the artist named the price.

The artist protested and assured him that, as portraits went, that was very little to ask.

Uncle Ben hesitated. "Well," he said at length, "how much will it be if I furnish the paint?"—Lippincott's.

No girl who is under sixteen years of age, according to a Berlin physician who is quoted in The Housekeeper, should be permitted to enter upon the study of the piano. He is said to have found that, of 1,000 girls who undertook piano practice before the age of twelve, 600 later became afflicted with some form of nervous disease; but of 1,000 whose musical education was neglected, only 100 ever suffered in this manner. From these statistics the doctor deduces the theory that fewer "finger exercises" and more exercise out of doors are the needs of girls nowadays.—[City and State.]

THE JEWS of New York are spending a million dollars a year in charity, most of which, as Israel Zangwill says, is expended to meet the wants of immigrant Jews driven out of Europe by persecution.

"Now, children," said the teacher, let us see what you remember about the animal kingdom and the domestic animals that belong to it. You have named all the domestic animals but one. Who can tell me what that one is? It has bristly hair, likes dirt, and is fond of getting into the mud." Miss Fanny looked expectantly around the room. "Can't you think, Tommy!" she asked encouragingly. "Yes'm," was the shameful reply. "It's me."—[Christian Guardian.]

GOOD WORDS FOR 1903. XLIX.

*It's a coal from God's altar must kindle our fire:
and without fire, true fire, no acceptable sacrifice.*

WILLIAM PENN.

THE WORLD IS TOO MUCH WITH US.

"THE World is too much with us." Night and day
No time have we to pause beside the way,
Where roadside flowers in tender beauty bloom,
Or violets veil the dust above the tomb.

"The world is too much with us," Pelf and sin,
The stress of self, and Earth's tumultuous din,
The ceaseless probing into things unknown,
Eat through our lives as acids through a stone.

"The world is too much with us," yet, if we Linked earnest effort to high purity,
Then we would cease through sordid care to grope,
And see at times, the shy, sweet face of Hope.

THE SPIRITUAL LIFE.¹

PAUL the Apostle in his letter to the Roman Christians makes use of many expressive terms and word-pictures to emphasize the distinction between those who had separated themselves from their former manner of life and were trying to live according to the precepts set forth by Paul's great Teacher, and those who were still living unrepentant and unblest. No one knew better than Paul the degradation of the life from which they had been called, and no one understood more thoroughly the struggle that must arise between old habits and desires, and the hopes and aspirations aroused by their entrance upon this New Way. The temptations to lapse into the old and forbidden life were so ever-present, and the habits of a lifetime had to be so constantly guarded against, that we find Paul, like the good teacher that he was, constantly referring to them with words of warning, and pointing out the way to overcome them with words of cheer.

He seems, in this letter, to have struck in a sentence, the vital difference between the old life and the new, when he says "For to be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace." He goes on immediately to expand the matter still further saying "Because the carnal mind is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be."

We can, if we choose, make three classifications of the kind of life a man may live. We may say, first that he may live a Physical Life. His main object in life would seem to be a gratification of sensuous pleasures, neither harmful nor objectionable, necessarily, but a gratification that may be both harmful and objectionable, and one that is sure to begin and end in self. The Romans of Paul's day, particularly the upper and ruling classes, lived such a selfish physical life. The forefathers of these Romans had for their object in life the extension of the Empire by the subjugation of its enemies, an object that we may look upon as an unworthy one; but it was immeasurably higher than that of their descendants of Paul's day, since their sole object and aim in life was the gratification of self; and that person is hopelessly lost who is unreservedly selfish.

Again we may say that a man may live an intellectual life. The Greeks, as Paul knew them, lived the intellectual life. Among them he found culture and refinement, but a culture and refinement that lacked the grace of altruism. An unselfish service of others did not enter practically into the Greek philosophy of life, however clear the expression of it may be in Greek literature.

The man who lives the Intellectual Life finds that it has much to recommend it. To live this life puts him into intimate relations with those worthies of past ages who have been impelled to put their thoughts into words. Every field of literary effort is open to his inspection and study. He turns the pages of history and feels within him the glow of enthusiasm with which the makers of history carved each for himself a place in the temple of achievement. The stirring tales of heroic deeds, the rhythmic song of the poet and the rich stores of dramatic art are his possession. In them he may live and with them he may fill the measure of his days. Whether this intellectual life is worth the living will depend entirely upon the use that is made of the lessons that it brings. We can conceive of those who make no use of its teachings except to satisfy the selfish enjoyment they feel in something well and artistically done, who permit their appreciation of the form of the story to obscure its high purpose, and see in the immortal song its literary excellence but not the spiritual impress that alone makes it immortal.

Above, and including both the physical and the intellectual, is the Spiritual Life. To live the spiritual life is to put one's self into intimate relations with the things that make for eternal truth. In his letter to the Ephesians Paul says "But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance, against such there is no law." Eph. v., 22-23. If we analyze these elements of the spiritual life, for that is what I understand Paul to mean by his statement of the "Fruits of the Spirit," we shall find that they are the characteristics that we most admire in the lives of our friends. It is probable that there was no intention in the mind of Paul to arrange them in the order of their relative importance. Whether there was or not, the first mentioned, "love," may be considered the foundation stone upon which the existence of all the others depends. This love is an unselfish love, a love that seeks its reward in the service that it can render, not in that which it can receive, that looks upon the giving of help to others as a great opportunity, and that takes its greatest satisfaction in securing the happiness of others. There have been two writers who have put the impress of their personality upon a characterization of love. Paul in the thirteenth chapter of I. Corinthians and Henry Drummond in "The Greatest Thing in the World." Paul stated the essence of it all when he said "Love suffereth long and is kind; love envieth not; love vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil."

These simple and ringing sentences have been amplified by Drummond in an attempt to make them come more nearly home to the requirements and understanding of the people of to-day, but to him who is living the spiritual life the words of Paul are as an open book telling the story of the divine character of love. How divine this character is, Christ indicated when he said "Greater love hath no man than this, that he will lay down his life for his friend." And again, "But I say unto you, Love your enemies." Here surely He did not mean "have affection" but rather "express towards your enemies all those qualities that are expressed in the love of God for man." There is, doubtless, no love that is more ennobling in its influence than that which is called love to God. To one who loves God the whole creation becomes a revelation of His attributes.

The majestic rising of the sun, the beauty of the flying clouds, the tender care of the mother bird for her young, and the crashing storm, uprooting dead and useless trees, are but the tokens of His presence, and the man who lives the spiritual life looks forward with eager anticipation to the fulfillment of the promise of Isaiah, "Eye hath not seen nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him." We sometimes think that it was easy for the old saints to live the spiritual life while it is difficult for us. This is because we know of their successes and of our failures. Their difficulties were just as real to them as ours are to us, in fact the obstacles in the path of the man who would live the spiritual life to-day are puerile in comparison with the cruel persecutions that pursued the man who was among the first to break away from his associates and attempted to live the life of the despised Christian. The misconception of the early days in regard to the spiritual life has not been entirely removed even at the present time. It is not at all unusual to find, especially among the young, those who think that gloom, sadness and despondency constitute the normal frame of mind of those who call themselves Christians. But the second in the list of the fruit of the spirit is joy. This is not merely the joy of living, but the joy that comes from an accurate conception of the relations between man and his maker. Who has a better title to be the possessor of joy, and to be possessed by it, than one who has carefully weighed the relative values of the finite and the infinite? Believing that all things work together for good to them who love God, he can pass through the most trying experiences of life with a serene confidence that, even in the midst of them all, fills his soul with an unshaken trust and a living joy. The possession of this fruit of the spirit is a blessing, not only to the man himself but to all with whom he comes in contact. He radiates good cheer and his pleasant greeting dissipates the clouds of discontent and helps many a despondent soul to surmount the obstacles that have stood as gloomy barriers in their pathway, and to take up again with renewed hope the duties that had seemed too heavy to be undertaken.

When the heavenly messengers appeared to the astonished shepherds who were keeping watch over their flocks by night, the greeting in their message was "Glory to God in the highest and, on earth peace, good will toward men." As Peace was a part of the divine message so it plays an important part in the spiritual life. No one more thoroughly appreciates the blessings of peace than he who has seen the horrors of war, and to no one does this "peace of God which passeth understanding" come with greater blessings than to one who has to spend his days in the active struggles of our modern business life. In the individual life peace may come with a freedom from fear, or want, or perplexing care. It is not necessary that these do not exist, but that there should be such an abiding faith in the goodness of God that fear and want and care are robbed of their terrors and a peace that the world with its perplexities and annoyances cannot take away becomes the abiding habit of the man who lives the spiritual life. Isaiah recognizes the conditions of this peace when he writes "O that thou hadst hearkened to my commandments! then had thy peace been as a river, and thy righteousness as the waves of the sea."

We have mentioned but three of the nine fruits of the spirit that are given in Paul's list. What visions the very names of the others bring to us of the living saints of God whose acquaintance we have been privileged to enjoy. Long suffering, patience under depressing circumstances, gentleness, the essential quality of the gentleman and the gentlewoman, goodness, the salt whose savor makes this earth a fit dwelling place for man, faith that can remove mountains of doubt and unbelief, meekness that brings rest to the soul and temperance that typifies a wholesome and effective self-control.

I have said that the spiritual life includes the physical and the intellectual, but we must not make the mistake of supposing that it depends upon them. Some of the noblest work has been done and some of the sweetest songs have been sung by those whose bodily infirmities have deprived them of an active participation in what is called the work of the world, and some of the most inspiring lives have been lived by those who could lay no claim to being intellectual.

What the possession of an abounding physical life and intellectual abilities brings to their possessor, is an enlarged opportunity and a just demand for greater results in the living of the Life Spiritual.

A TYPICAL FRIEND OF THE OLDEN TIME.

In looking over the memoir of Enoch Lewis, born in 1776, and well known in Eastern Pennsylvania as a mathematician and teacher of his department at Westtown Friends' School in its early days, I find the mention of characteristics and opinions of an interesting nature. The testimonies he upheld are those of the true Christian, and are as valuable now as in the time he lived. They are those which neutralize barbarism, and forward civilization, and are of the highest importance in all lands and in all times. He seems to have been a typical Friend, and his influence on his pupils and his impress on the time were naturally in accordance with the strength and purity of his character. The memoir is a pamphlet of 111 pages, prepared by his son, Hon. Joseph J. Lewis, from which I make a few extracts.

GRACEANNA LEWIS.

Media, Pa., Eleventh month 10, 1903.

One who knew Enoch Lewis as a boy said of him, "He was high-spirited and quick-tempered, but somehow or other never got into quarrels. . . . Though so sober-minded that most of us were rather in awe of him, he would not tell tales on his mischievous school fellows, but would persist in keeping silence, when he could not deny his knowledge of our pranks."

At fifteen he was accounted a full hand in gathering in the harvest, and led the reapers and mowers in the field.

At that time it was the custom to give spirituous liquors to workmen in harvest. His father disliked the practice and yielded to it with reluctance, increased by experience of its debasing results. Being a man of deep piety and of nice moral sensibilities, his mind was at times profoundly troubled on the subject. He sometimes said that by reason of the excitement and turbulence caused by the use of liquor, he feared that he lost as much in Christian progress during the time of harvest as he was able to gain with all his diligence during the rest of the year. To add to his anxiety and dread, his own sons were necessarily exposed to the temptation of indulging with others in the customary beverage. Although so young and inexperienced, Enoch, having noticed the degrading effects of the practice, resolved to abstain from all alcoholic drinks, and, having once taken his stand, he was not to be moved, boy as he was, by persuasion or ridicule. There were companions of his harvest labors who laughed at him for his persistent singularity, but who in after times may have lamented their own fatal delusion, when they found themselves, before they were well aware whither the current of their fate was tending, whirled in the giddy circle of that maelstrom whose sweep is ruin, and whose vortex is death.

At about fifteen years of age, Enoch was employed to teach in Radnor School, where he had recently been a pupil, and where many young men were several years his senior. The uniform steadiness of the young teacher, his firm and decided manner, joined with moderation, made him master of the situation. No school was more orderly or apparently more easily governed. Year by year he improved his opportunities, bought books and studied alone, and made himself sufficiently familiar with Latin to study books in that language, at the same time that he supported himself by teaching. When under twenty years of age he was led by curiosity to visit the hall of the Philadelphia Library, for the purpose of examining Newton's "Principia." Andrew Ellicott, who had been a major in the army of the Revolution, and then been lately appointed one of the commissioners for making some surveys, and laying out certain towns in Western Pennsylvania, happened to be present. Ellicott was himself a mathematician of very respectable acquirements, and was surprised to hear a rustic, homespun-looking youth asking for such a book, and particularly when he appeared to examine it with such interest and attention as manifested a knowledge of the language and the subject. After a second interview Ellicott informed the youth that he was about to form a company of surveyors on the western frontiers of Pennsylvania, and offered him an appointment in that service, at the rate of half a guinea a day, exclusive of traveling expenses and provisions, beyond Harrisburg. The offer was accepted, and the young man became one of the company without knowing that a military escort was to be a part of the expedition. Had he known it before leaving Philadelphia, he would have declined the service; but he fared as the rest, and was under no roof from the time he left Harrisburg in the spring until their return late in the following fall. The survey for the town of Le Boeuf was entrusted to Enoch Lewis and another surveyor, but at the instance of the former, without a military guard. In a company of sixty men for these western surveys he was the only person adhering to the dress and mode of speech peculiar to Friends, but these peculiarities caused no disrespect either by the commissioners or their subordinates, who had learned to appreciate the sterling worth of this accurate and wholly reliable person. On the contrary, Andrew Ellicott treated him with great kindness and consideration, taking pains to inform his parents of their respect for his talents and their approbation of his conduct.

One of the commissioners had been a general in the army of the Revolution, had been a member of Congress, and of the Convention that formed the Constitution of Pennsylvania. He had commanded several years at Fort Pitt, now Pittsburg, had seen much of frontier life, and had been accustomed to deal with men of the rudest description. Unfortunately he had become somewhat habituated to the use of profane language, and when excited was rather profuse in hard epithets. He soon perceived that profanity was disagreeable to the plain young Friend, and in his presence was so considerate as generally to avoid it. Occasions of irritation would, however, occur, and then his impetuous Irish temper was too strong for his self-restraint, and he would break out into volleys of oaths. On one of these occasions he turned to the young man, and although thirty years his senior, apologized for using such language. "It is an ungentlemanly and unchristian practice," said he; "I know it is, but these scoundrels can never be made to believe that I am in earnest till I thunder at them like a heathen." "They obey me very well when I happen to give them an order," replied the gentle Friend. "Yes, yes," said the General, "your manner don't require swearing. I can't get along without it, but I assure you I mean to quit it when I get home. If I should quit it now, not a soul would stir when I speak."

On their return from their field of labor, after their hardships in a life in the woods, when the company all met at Pittsburg, they were disposed to relaxation and indulgence. Wine was deemed essential to good cheer, and no social entertainment was considered complete without it. A visitor of distinction was one day present when a young man belonging to the expedition indulged too freely and became garrulous and foolish. Mortified with this behavior of a companion, Enoch Lewis slipped away before the wine came upon the board. By this act, he became aware of a want he experienced in the loss of the accustomed glass of wine, and seeing his own danger, he at once resolved to renounce the use of wine and to avoid the risks attendant upon it. To resolve and to do were practically the same thing at that time of his life and ever after.

NEW TESTAMENT LESSON.—No. 44.

WHAT IS TRUTH?

GOLDEN TEXT.—He that overcometh shall inherit these things; and I will be his God, and he shall be my son.—Revelation, xxi., 7.

Before study of Lesson read Revelation, xxi., 1-8; xxii., 3-14; John xviii., 33-38.

WITH the present lesson those who have followed this series reach the end of five years' consecutive study of the Old and New Testaments. And as we turn back to survey once more the way we have come, the question of Pilate rises to our lips, What is truth? What principle underlies the testimony of prophets, seers and apostles in all their variety of condition and of expression? In what sense does Jesus fulfill, not destroy, "the law"? And what is "the truth," to bear witness to which Jesus was born?

Some things we can confidently say are not "the truth." Not all true things deserve the term in the high sense in which Jesus uses it. There are multitudes of matters of fact which are not worth bearing witness to in any large way. Perhaps, indeed, it is not too much to say, that no mere temporary fact calls for the testimony of the prophet. Was Moses set adrift in a basket? It is not unlikely, but it is not important. Did the walls of Jericho fall down at the sound of the Hebrew trumpets? It does not seem probable, but it is of no particular consequence. Did Elisha make iron to float? Did Moses write the Pentateuch? Was Solomon the wisest of men? Was Jesus born of a virgin? Did he make water into wine? Did the apostles speak in unknown tongues? All these and many more are questions of general interest in some ways, but there is no answer to any one of them which is worth living and dying for. All such questions must be decided according to the laws of evidence. We must find what witnesses are available as to the facts in question, and on the basis of their testimony we must either reach conclusions or decide that conclusions cannot be reached. These are really matters of history and not religious questions at all.

Another class of questions must be decided in a somewhat similar way. The nature of God is a scientific question. Is there one God or are there many? Is God a unity or a trinity? Is there an evil deity as well as a good one? What is the origin of man and what is his destiny? Is there a future life and what is its nature? These must be determined, if they can be determined, exactly as are other scientific questions—by collecting and classifying facts and generalizing from them. And in many cases we must accustom ourselves to "the agony of a suspended judgment." Not that we may not individually have special revelations in these matters, and not that these may not be a sufficient basis for faith; but such revelations are of necessity personal, and unless numerous and alike, have little weight in carrying conviction to others. If they are numerous and similar, then they become facts of sufficient importance for science to classify and verify, if possible.

But religion is the art of living. It is not a thing to believe, but an attitude toward life. It is not a something which calls for assent, but a something which calls for conduct. And we find that the keynote of the testimony of the prophets is individualism. Each man must live his own life. He must make his own habits determine his own acts, and endure the consequences, whatever they may be. Out of individualism proceeds duty. Something within him must decide which of many ways he will choose. This something may be his selfish desire, caprice, or custom. But the prophets proclaimed as the basis of duty a law written on the heart, a teaching, not of man, but of God. And this claim is verifiable. We may seek it in our own natures and find it there; and, having found it, we may follow it.

The Christian builds still higher. He knows and obeys the law within him, thus fulfilling the law and the prophets. But he accomplishes this result by coming under the influence of a higher and deeper principle than that of duty—and that is the power of brotherly love. Duty thus attains to a soul and becomes alive. The Christian labors not blindly to live up to a law, but he labors lovingly with the aim of it all in sight. He is not merely saving his soul, but he is helping on God's purposes as to man. Such transformation of life cannot be commanded. Man can only put himself into a receptive condition and pray, "Thy kingdom come." When God's revealings come they are a free gift. And as man cannot command them, neither can he command himself. His desires, his passions, his personal loves and hates may at any time force him into injustice and disobedience. Wherefore he must lay down the attempt and surrender himself to the control of that higher self which is divine. As the prophets sought to free men from external control, Jesus sought to lead them voluntarily to subject themselves to a new servitude based on self-surrender; a laying down of lower life to take up the higher life of service.

Our love to those who love us is easy to show. It is comparatively simple to show our benevolence to all whom we meet. But in our time and nation that large and impersonal love which we owe to every human being must, if it is not to degenerate into mere sentimentality, show itself in active citizenship. What love owes to humanity at large is justice, not vague longings, luxurious sentiments. And that justice can be reached mainly through our citizenship. No man can be a good Christian who is not a good citizen. No man is a good citizen who does not use his powers as a citizen to extend the domain of the kingdom of righteousness.

THE OFFSHOOTS OF CONCORD.

THE summer schools are closed now. Each year new ones are started, and it is safe to say that there are no specialties now that cannot be procured in vacation-time by busy people.

It is many years since Emerson, Alcott, Thoreau, Hawthorne, Dr. Harris, Thomas Davidson, and numbers of other distinguished men founded the first summer school of philosophy. It was a little, plain, single-roomed board building, looking like a primitive school-house, in Bronson Alcott's "back yard." Here the long-haired, silver-tongued Alcott plied Socratic questions; here Emerson, the long-faced, keen-eyed Yankee, uttered his epigrammatic, disconnected other-world wisdom, touched by the spicy flavor of the canny farmers about; and here the truculent, red-headed Davidson, with his phenomenal verbal memory, dealt with philosophy as though it were a kind of mental prize-fight. Half the distinguished men of letters of that generation in America took their turn to talk in the little Concord schoolhouse.

That generation has passed away, and only a few men remain who recall its palmy days, but in two places, at least, offshoots of the Concord school still flourish. So early in 1888, Thomas Davidson started a school of philosophy on his own account in Farmington, and the following year moved it to Glen Moore in the Adirondacks. Here throughout July and August of each year many of the best available men gather and talk, and many forthcoming philosophical books are outlined and discussed here.

But what different offshoots spring from the same parent tree! On the coast of Maine, inland four or five miles, and upon the tidal river Piscataqua, is another child of the Concord school—a daughter this time, for the "eternal womanly" reigns supreme in the method and arrangement of Greenacre. Greenacre is a sort of conference of religions. Philosophy is not barred out, but it is not a main feature. Here Buddhist yogis in flowing robes, Persian prophets in gold-embroidered vestments, Jewish rabbis, and Catholic priests present and discuss their various faiths.

One of the most picturesque features of the year in Greenacre is the Buddhist flower festival, given in August, under the full moon; the day of the year when, it is said, the spirits are nearest the earth. At this time prayers are most readily heard and answered. But the spirits are exacting. It is only to the pure in heart and body that they come. The day must be one of strict fast and of pure and kindly thoughts; of solitude and quiet, and one's garb must be entirely of white. At night under an enormous pine-tree an altar is raised covered with white flowers and decorated with thirty-seven lighted candles. It was a strange sight this year to see the white-robed pilgrims, about one hundred in number, each bearing a lighted candle, sitting motionless for an hour or more in a circle around the motionless yogis. Slowly the August full moon rose, at first making gaunt shadows from the giant pine waver over the ground, and then sending shafts of light under its boughs. Merely as a spectacular scene, it was unsurpassed.

A slight protest these schools of philosophy and religion may seem against the colossally commercial spirit of the age, and yet, however faint-voiced the protest, it is still in the spirit of the Concord protest fifty years before.—[Harper's Weekly.]

CONVERSION ONLY THE BEGINNING.—The new birth does not mean that the man is full grown any more than natural birth does. It simply means that the new life has begun, and that if it is allowed its freedom, and if it is lived according to the rules of health (for there are spiritual rules of health, as well as physical ones), it will grow in strength and knowledge. A person thus born from above may be very far from what he is to be when he shall have attained even a moderate growth in the Christian life. He lacks experience altogether, he lacks knowledge, he may fall into mistakes and even sins. But there is one thing that he must not lack, for lacking it he will soon cease to be a Christian at all. He must not lack this; that the chief desire of his life is to discover God's will and to do it, to discover the blessings that God has for him and for others through him, and to receive the one and hand forth the others.—[Interchange, Baltimore.]

WITH God—go over the sea;
Without him, not over the threshold!

BUSINESS MEETINGS.

THE difficulty in securing representative attendance and active interest in our business meetings has led, in recent years, to very free discussion of the reasons for this, and many suggestions have been offered to promote a better condition of affairs. Fundamentally the business of any organized body ought to prosper, for if its business management is at fault, the requisite machinery for active religious work lacks guidance. In many instances the time of holding these meetings has been changed to an hour better suited to the convenience of the members with a favorable effect upon the attendance and interest. Meetings that have solved the problem of non-attendance in this way do not at present need to seek further change; but many small meetings exist that keep up little more than the form of a business meeting. It seems to us that in every community of Friends, there should be enough of common business interest in the affairs of the Society to invite a general attendance of members.

Some years ago our business meetings had taken on a set formalism as to the kind of business that should be considered therein, and a stereotyped manner of conducting business which we fondly believed was according to George Fox's ideal. This gradually led to a consideration of most of the affairs that really interested the membership in organizations outside the regular business meetings. The First-day school associations, the philanthropic union, the young Friends' associations, absorbed the active, vigorous thought and interest of the members. The business meetings awoke to the fact that they must assume what had become a large part of the business interests of Friends, if they hoped to live; and we have as a result the query as to First-day schools, the appointment of First-day school and philanthropic committees by the meeting, and the consideration of business incident to their existence.

We urge that the meetings be not allowed to settle down into a newer formalism based upon these committee reports, added to the routine business of the past. We must not allow outside agencies constantly to divert interest from the meeting. The business meeting is a place for the consideration of any concern that affects the interests and activities of the Society. The volume of business to be transacted in some places may make it necessary to relegate to committees business which in the smaller meetings should form a fitting and interesting part of the monthly meeting business. We have, so far as we know, no laws of exclusiveness. The desire of its founders was that all business be soberly and weightily considered, and that such mutual forbearance should at all times exist, that decisions would be reached in unity rather than by majority. Business needs to proceed at as rapid a rate as is consistent with deliberate judgment. The painfully slow transaction of a small amount of routine business, which is not to affect the interests or movements of the members during the month that follows, invites absence from the meeting.

Every organized body of Friends ought to have some activities under its control about which its members need to confer. Reports from other Friendly centers of action that are of business interest to the Society at large, are in order even if there is no minute to bring up such a report, or the meeting has no standing committee on the subject. Indeed, we need more moving committees, rather than a multiplication of standing ones in our meetings.

The entire retinue of complaints about the dullness of business meetings would pass away if we had business of interest to our members to engage our attention, and conducted the meetings as we would carry on any other business enterprise which we desired to make successful. The traditions of our ancestors have always a certain weight and educational value to us, but their needs were not identical with ours. If we were as faithful and diligent in following our own light as some of us are in trying to follow that which shines dimly through the mist of years, we should become an active and striving church, with so much business of interest to us that we should have to economize time in every possible way to give it all proper place and attention.

GEORGE FOX'S CREED.

A LEAFLET sent us by the Friends' Tract Association (London), number 228 of their series, contains in convenient form for distribution the letter of George Fox to the Governor of Barbadoes, 1671; an interesting document showing that the "founder of Quakerism" had no new and innovating theological doctrine to promulgate, but held, for the most part, the accepted Christian theories of his time. In this letter he expresses his beliefs about God, Christ, the Bible, almost in the very words of the historic creeds of the church of that time, and that may be heard recited in Orthodox churches to-day.

The tract is valuable as a reminder that George Fox's distinctive message had to do not with theological matters but with spiritual. His mission was not to set the world right in speculative theology, as it is not the mission of Friends to-day to try to set the world right in this regard, nor to insist on setting one another right. One needs to be a good deal of a philosopher, learned in the schools, and besides to have a decided metaphysical turn, to accomplish anything of real value to the world in speculative theology. Most of us are hardly more qualified to speak with authority in these matters than we are to decide important questions in chemistry or in bridge building.

The mission of George Fox was to get men interested in the eternal things of life instead of the merely fleeting, trifling things of the hour; to get them to live the life of the spirit and not merely the material and intellectual life; to get even the humblest to understand that he, as well as the richest or the most learned, had equal access to the Quickener of the spiritual life. The mission of Friends to-day is no other, and the world to-day needs to be called to things eternal as much as it did in George Fox's time; it is not in urgent need now, any more than then, of any prophet of a new and startling, nor yet of an old and "sound," theological theory.

In handing this leaflet to those not familiar with the attitude of Friends, it is important to make it clear that the letter is of interest to us as a matter of biography and not as a binding, or even as a representative, statement of the belief of Friends. Many of us could use the language George Fox uses and in some of our Disciplines almost the same wording is still found; but there are many other Friends who would not think of using the formula of a man of the seventeenth century to express their theological ideas, any more than they would go to the works of a seventeenth century scientist to get a formula by which the better to understand some chemical reaction, or to the works of the earliest students of mechanics to get plans and specifications for some great modern building.

It is important that we be explicit in these matters, for it is very hard for those accustomed to subscribing to the creed of their sect to understand the position of Friends in this regard, and how those of different views can worship together without disowning one another and without the necessity of concealing their deviations of thought from one another.

BIRTHS.

JONES.—In Merchantville, N. J., Tenth month 12th, 1903, to B. Henry and Elizabeth Stokes Jones, a daughter, who is named Marian Elizabeth Jones.

TEMPLE.—At Lansdowne, Pa., on Eleventh month 21st, 1903, to Edward Brinton and Lucy Bartram Temple, a daughter, who is named Elizabeth Bartram Temple.

TILTON.—In New York City, on the 25th of Ninth month, to Edward L. and Mary Bigelow Tilton, a daughter, who is named Mary Elizabeth.

WILLIAMS.—At San Francisco, Eleventh month 16th, 1903, to J. Paul J. and Marie Welsh Williams, a son, who is named Ralph Welsh Williams.

DEATHS.

BELL.—Suddenly, at the Manor, Hudson, N. Y., on the 12th of Eleventh month, in the 85th year of her age, Harriet Thomas Bell, widow of James C. Bell. She was a member of New York Meeting. She leaves four sons and one daughter. The youngest son, James Harvey Bell, served with great credit as Mayor of Yonkers for several years, where he has always lived.

FLAGG.—On Fourth-day, Eleventh month 25th, 1903, at his home in Swarthmore, Dr. J. Foster Flagg, in the 76th year of his age.

His many years of service as a dentist, and as a lecturer in one of Philadelphia's Dental Colleges, made him the personal friend of a large number of men and women to whom his death is a personal bereavement. He had that rare quality of sympathy by which he knew the needs of others, and how best to minister to them. His beneficent life 'lent constant argument to his neighbor's creed,' in behalf of integrity and sincerity and loving-kindness—these "things of the spirit" that put upon the passing years the stamp of the eternal. E. P. B.

GARRETT.—In Media, Pa., on Eleventh month 17th, 1903, Martha Garrett, in her 97th year. A life-long member with Friends. Interment at Newtown, Delaware Co., Friends' Burying Ground.

LUKENS.—At Oakland, California, Eleventh month 26th, Helen Mar Lukens, youngest daughter of Courtland F. Lukens, who is now a resident of Orange City, Florida.

MARSHALL.—In Kennett township, on Eleventh month 28th, 1903, Elizabeth M. Marshall, aged 77 years, widow of the late Lewis Marshall of Newlin. Interment at Longwood. Her death removes another most lovable and useful woman from this community. Her aid in behalf of the Flower Mission to which beautiful philanthropy she has given largely of her time and strength for several years, will be greatly missed. As a writer she was quite well-known and was gifted with poetic talent that has been favorably recognized. Through her great-grandmother she was descended from the famous painter, Benjamin West.

McILVAIN.—At her home near Mt. Holly, N. J., Eleventh month 18th, 1903, Rebecca B. McIlvain, in her 89th year.

PRICE.—Suddenly, Eleventh month 24th, 1903, at 1639 Race street, Philadelphia, Sarah Townsend Price, for many years Principal of Friends' Primary School, 15th and Race Sts.

SMEDLEY.—In Willistown, Chester Co., Pa., Eleventh month 1st, Elwood Smedley, in his 83d year. An Elder of Goshen Monthly Meeting of Friends.

TAYLOR.—At Columbus, N. J., on the 14th of Eleventh month, Caleb S. Taylor, son of the late William C. and Emily S. Taylor, in the 61st year of his age.

He was a birthright member of the Society of Friends, and possessed a meek and quiet spirit, always bearing his afflictions with Christian patience and fortitude.

We know that it is well with thee, dear one,

Thy work is finished and thy soul at rest.

It is the recompense God kindly gives,

And He is love, and surely love knows best.

WALKER.—At her home, Waterford, Va., Eleventh month 23d, 1903, Mary H. Walker, daughter of the late James M. and Eliza H. Walker, in the 57th year of her age. A life-long member of Fairfax Monthly Meeting.

NOTES.

ELIZABETH LLOYD has a minute from Buckingham Monthly Meeting, endorsed by Bucks Quarterly Meeting, to visit isolated Friends in their homes as far west as the Pacific Coast, and appoint meetings among them as way opens. The feeling that she ought to undertake this work has been growing with her for years, and she now hopes that nothing will prevent her entering upon it about the middle of First month, 1904. Her present plan of travel (which is subject to change) is to go west via Pittsburg, Columbus, Cincinnati, Indianapolis, St. Louis, Kansas City, Topeka, Omaha, Lincoln, Denver, Pueblo and Albuquerque to Los Angeles; going thence to San Francisco she will return via Portland, Helena, Minneapolis, St. Paul, Chicago (running down from there to Peoria), Detroit, Toledo and Cleveland. Friends living on or near this route who desire a visit from her are requested to write her at Lansdowne, Pa., (or at the office of FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER), so that she may include them in her plans. She will give four months to this work, returning in time for Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

The Abington Meeting House, near Jenkintown, Pa., one of the earliest places of worship built in Pennsylvania by the Society of Friends, has just been renovated. The interior has been replastered and repainted and the woodwork was renewed wherever necessary.

Repairs were made to the big old-fashioned galleries, which were built about 1750, but it was found that the timbers were as sound as when they were put in place. The workmen were amazed not only by the remarkable preservation, but by the generous amount of strong material used for the limited capacity the galleries were called upon to accommodate.

Regular First-day meetings have been resumed in the building. A carpet has also been laid, a luxury that earlier worshippers there did not enjoy. This meeting originated at the home of Thomas Fairman, at Shackamaxon, soon after the arrival of William Penn. Its two hundredth anniversary was celebrated on Twelfth month 3d, 1882. For a time the members worshipped in private houses. In 1697 John Barnes gave 120 acres of land in Abington for the erection of the present edifice.—[Philadelphia Press.]

Lansdowne Friends held their first Monthly Meeting in the new house on the evening of Eleventh month 23d. The stillness both within and without was very grateful in contrast with the noise that surrounded the meetings while held in Birker Hall. The feeling of thankfulness and peace that filled all hearts was voiced by J. Eugene Baker and Elizabeth Lloyd.

In the business meeting two new members were received on certificate and application for membership was made by a mother and daughter who have attended the meeting quite regularly. The total cost of ground, house and furniture will be a little over $10,000; of this amount about $1,400 is yet to be raised. The meeting had decided to do without a carpet until the house was all paid for; a kind Friend hearing of this, gave $200 for the purchase of a carpet.

The First-day School on the 29th, was unusually large, several being present who had not before attended. About sixty were in attendance at the meeting, many of whom were children, and again the outward quiet made it easier for all hearts to gather into the stillness.

On the 22d of Eleventh month our First-day morning meeting at York, Pa., was attended by Frank Ball, of Quaker-town, Pa. A goodly number of Friends and Friendly people were present. Friend Ball presented the principles of religion in a very happy and inspiring manner—impressing the value of cheerfulness and of fair dealings with our fellow-men—that it is the real practical every-day religious life that fits us for the enjoyment of the Father's blessing. At an informal conference after meeting Friend Ball read a paper on "The More Abundant Life," which contained many helpful thoughts and was much appreciated. He dwelt upon the Divine creative power and the indwelling of this Spirit in each individual soul. He encouraged the young people to live up to their highest standard of right—that the religious life is not a gloomy one, but one of everlasting joy and peace. B. K. C.

A parents' meeting was held at Abington in Friends' meeting-house, Third-day afternoon, Eleventh month 24th. Three subjects were considered, "How shall parents keep up with literary work without neglecting home duties?" A fine paper was read by Carrie Coggins, of Philadelphia, which was followed by a discussion. A paper on "The Relation of the Home to the School," was read by Cynthia Bosler, of Ogontz, followed by a discussion by Rachel Martin, teacher in Abington Friends' School, and Susan H. Jarrett, of Hatboro. "How shall we teach our children to show respect to the aged?" a paper by Emma W. Gaskill, of Jenkintown, was followed by general discussion.—[Doylestown Intelligencer.]

Percy Bigland, of Chelsea, England, the artist who painted the Quaker Wedding, is now the guest of Isaac H. Clothier at Wynnewood, Pa. We understand that he expects to remain in this country several months.

COMMUNICATION.

NEIGHBORS.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

YOUR editorial of some time past, entitled "On Being Neighbors," was of interest. In it you speak of the necessity of settlement work in one's own neighborhood, among less cultured neighbors, mingling among them as "friends on equal terms, claiming that the settlement workers have found that for them it has not been a self-sacrifice but a self-development."

If we could mingle with our neighbors in the consecrated spirit that true settlement workers have, we would do a great good and be strengthened in our own souls. But we must have that consecrated spirit and if we come in touch with these less fortunate ones (from a worldly standpoint) it must be with a soul touch—there we can meet on common ground and commune one with the other understandingly.

Once the writer stood in the door of a hospitable city home, side by side with the owner. A tramp came up the steps, asking for aid, addressing the owner of the house as "Brother." It may have been only a professional beggar's trick to win attention, it may have been far more, but the lesson learned then has never been forgotten, and often as city streets are paced, and weary faces are met and passed by, the terms "brother" or "sister" will come up in thought and the heart is softened by the titles which prove all God's family of earth one, after all.

Why is it that in this new century, so many of us are learning to bury the deeper soul self under a round of gaiety, of dissipation and light talk, and only in church, meeting, or in the face of some deep calamity, is the soul permitted to shine forth?

Are we ashamed of this greater Christ self within us all?—the / that in the Great Forever must rule supreme if we are to ever reach the Heaven of our desires? Are the Society of Friends, as a whole, true in daily practice to their own doctrine, "The indwelling Christ spirit"?

A few of the older ones spiritualized, uplifted by lives of experience have learned what the much-lauded-about Christian scientists and mental scientists are trying to teach—the power of the I, the Christ within, but do the young ones understand? They read about it, they hear it in sermons, but the real putting in practice can be taught also. Is it?

In the early days of the Society, when persecutions brought out this soul self more, lives seemed tuned to higher chords and even the veil of the unseen was oft lifted and the eye of spirit read what the eye of flesh could not, and "God truly walked with the sons of men."

The silent worship of the Friends is beautiful. When rightly understood it is the one true worship, but in the grand old cathedrals across the sea, and in her own home land, the writer has kneeled and worshipped also, and found again the same silent communion; and from Brother Lawrence, the Roman Catholic monk, to the Society of Friends, and also the true teachers of our day, the practice of the "Presence of God," is taught. But until Catholic and Protestant alike learn like Brother Lawrence, in the past century, to live the life, to practice the Presence hourly within ourselves, even if need be as a school lesson is conned, we are not consecrated, not fit for the neighborhood idea, here or elsewhere, for we cannot understand our brother and in our zeal we may interfere with that which concerns us not, for every man's hearth in palace or cabin should be a sacred altar, and we may rashly tread where angels fear to.

Mickleton, N. J. LAURA LIPPINCOTT PANCOAST.

BUCKS QUARTERLY MEETING.

BUCKS QUARTERLY MEETING, held at Middletown, falling as it does on Thanksgiving, is always more largely attended than any other meeting in the quarter, the one on Fifth-day being no exception to the rule, though the house was not crowded as many times in previous years, the galleries especially showing a number of vacant seats.

INDIVIDUAL RESPONSIBILITY.

An opening prayer was made by Sarah Bonsall, who afterward spoke, prefacing her remarks by several beautiful Scripture promises. She queried why we were assembled, whether to give thanks, to mingle socially, or to worship the Almighty God? She advised that we worship according to our light, spoke of the beauty of silence, and that the spoken word was not necessary to perfect worship, though the young may feel the need of it, for which she could not blame them; in time they may feel differently. She emphasized the necessity for individual responsibility; life is short, and it is important to work now. We should not distress ourselves about our neighbors, but tend our own gardens and all would be well.

BUILDING OF CHARACTER.

Nathaniel Richardson, of Byberry, took for his texts, "Ye believe in God, believe also in me." "In my Father's house are many mansions. I go to prepare a place for you." He spoke of the great value of human life, and that no one should be allowed to drift away on a current of unbelief. In building a house of faith, as well as a material house, it is important to have a good foundation. Human character should be built on an eternal foundation, a foundation already laid, even the foundation of Jesus Christ. Of belief in miracles he said, we must believe in the vast recuperative power of the human system through the power of God within. It is impossible for God's purposes to be fulfilled without the co-operation of man. Men do not respond to God's call; but to be saved we need to do the will of the Father. That which drew men to Christ and made them his followers was his deep spirituality.

HONESTY OF PURPOSE.

Margaret Howard, of Philadelphia, followed in a brief sermon on purity, and honesty of purpose. In part she said: "Everything grows like its environment is a true rule, but man can choose for himself purity of life, honesty of purpose, and all things that are lovely and should cultivate the state of mind to see what is good. We all have the power to hold ourselves to that which is best, and if we do so, will be at peace with God and our fellow men."

David Newport spoke on Thanksgiving, and paid a tribute to the memory of the late Isaac H. Hillborn.

NO LIFE PERFECT.

Mary Travilla, of West Chester, spoke of the year that had passed since we last assembled in this house, and of what would be revealed if we could read the open book of the lives here as we read the book of nature. All had made some honorable record; on many pages would be found the thread of true work; but no doubt there would be pages not open to the neighbor's inspection, pages on which were recorded impatience, irritability, anger, etc., but through them the soul may have risen to heights of self-control. No life is so perfect as to be void of mistakes, and our failures are spurs, as victories are wings. Even in the low-down life there is some germ of a better, the power of growth, which does not respond to formal worship, but to the human touch. All need to be helped to believe in their higher and nobler selves. She closed with a loving tribute to Isaac H. Hillborn, "to whom it was no stay to development to lay aside the mantle of flesh."

Elizabeth Lloyd spoke feelingly of Isaac H. Hillborn, whose voice had so often been heard at this quarterly meeting. She dwelt on the simplicity and honesty of his character, and that he was beloved not for what he owned, but for what he was; that he had received the baptism of the Spirit and of fire—the fire which burns away the dross and leaves truth, honor and justice. He illustrated the beauty of the higher life and spiritual growth in his ministry. She spoke of the value of a life like his to others, and hoped the same baptism of spirit and fire might come on all of us.

QUERIES READ.

In the business meeting, which immediately followed the religious meeting, all of the representatives except five responded to their names.

The first, second and eighth queries, with answers from the constituent monthly meetings, were read, each set of answers being followed by considerable vocal expression.

A minute from Buckingham Monthly Meeting for Elizabeth Lloyd to visit isolated Friends in the West, as far as the Pacific Coast, and appoint meetings among them as way opened, was endorsed by the quarterly meeting.—[Doylestown Intelligencer.]

OUR Consul-General at London has recommended that the mails be closed against publications advertising estates in foreign countries awaiting missing heirs. Both the Embassy and the Consulate are at times, flooded with complaints of those who have been victimized by this method. E E

THE National Grange Patrons of Husbandry passed, in open session, a resolution in its recent convention at Rochester indorsing suffrage for women, and pledging its influence "to secure for them this right, protective of all other rights, a voice in the government under which they live."

FOR PEACE.

The Pennsylvania Branch of the Universal Peace Union, notice of whose thirty-seventh anniversary meeting at the Young Friends' Association Building, Philadelphia, Twelfth month 8th, is given in our Calendar of Events of Interest to Friends, makes the following appeal:

The gains for Peace encourage us to labor on and obtain more. Nations are still groaning under immense war debts and the military spirit is taking possession of the people. And yet ever since the Czar's Rescript and The Hague Conference there are evidences of an indisposition to go to war. The English Government makes it known it would welcome a limitation of militarism. The Anglo-French Arbitration Treaty is assured. Chili and the Argentine Republic agree to forego the completion of four great battle-ships and take off their largest guns from their warships, and make them merchantmen. The Alaska Boundary settlement; the adjustment of the Preferential Claims against Venezuela; the inter-visitation of crowned heads of Europe; Belgium proposing to demobilize one battalion for every two demobilized by Turkey; these with arbitrations of daily occurrence and many more evidences of pacific conditions urge us onward to ask, Who will help us?

We appeal to our friends and fellow-citizens everywhere for doubled contributions and co-operation. Send now a Thanksgiving Offering to Charles P. Hastings, Treasurer, 1305 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

EDUCATIONAL.

PARENTS AND TEACHERS.

[Extracts from the address of Robert Henry Marsh, President of the Old Scholars' Association of Ackworth Friends' School (England) at the annual meeting of the Association. The address is published in full in the Report (No. 22) of the Ackworth Old Scholars' Association for 1905.]

The training of those who shall grow into clear-sighted, upright men and women is the work alike of parents and of teachers, and the parents must be active partners and co-workers with the teachers if the best results are to be obtained. It was a head-master of no small experience who, in reply to a complaint of one of his masters as to the ill-doings of a certain boy, simply said, "Hast thou seen his father?" He meant that that master would have had a deal more patience with the boy had he realized the conditions under which that boy had been brought up; the fact is one which we parents ought always to keep in our minds. I know that some people are under the impression that so long as they can only manage to ship their children off to a boarding-school, then, no matter how little care they may have bestowed upon them at home, they can rely upon the school turning them out creditable specimens of boyhood and girlhood: this no doubt is very complimentary to the school but uncommonly hard upon its staff. In that delightful book, Some Observations of a Foster Parent, by J. C. Tarver, we read, "Any human being, by the mere act of becoming a parent or a town councillor, considers himself a fully qualified educational authority." As regards the fathers and mothers in our Society, in connection with their duties toward their children and their schools, I trust the statement does not hold true. Think for a moment of the enormous responsibilities we put upon the teachers to whom we send our children away from home. We remember—only too well, do we not?—the sense of loneliness that came over us the first night any child of ours was away at school as we stood by the empty bed and realized how our boy or girl had entered a new stage in the path of life, had set foot in a wider world than the sheltered one of home, and that we must be content to follow them now with our love and not with our sight. To the teachers is committed the care of our children, and their aim, as our aim, is to train the children to walk alone. We know how on entering the world of school a boy learns for the first time the reality of public opinion as a great force in a way he could never have done at home, learns to sink mere self in his interest in his team or class, and develops too a manliness that makes him able, if need be, to take his own course at all odds. This is the reason why parents are content to let their children go away from them, knowing, as they do, the immense value of the training they are getting under the able men and women who conduct our schools, and the lessons they are also learning in the playing-fields, the work-shop and the leisure hour pursuits. Home too may all the time be kept in very close touch with the boy or girl by frequent home letters, the regularity of which no stress of work or weariness will be allowed to interrupt if once the habit is formed. Two letters a week, at any rate, keep home so near and maintain the close bond between parent and child without in the least interfering with the hearty enjoyment of school life.

As for after school days—I am dealing with the parents for the moment—it seems to me that what we have to aim at is that the same sympathy, which is so powerful an influence, shall be increased rather than diminished in all our relations with our children. We cannot expect that a boy will grow up the exact image of his father—there is no doubt about the fact that there will be very great room for improvement in the case of the father—in the case of the mother, of course, it is not so, for in very many instances, fortunately, improvements would be perfectly impossible. I remember a Friend, speaking in the Yearly Meeting some years ago in connection with a complaint as to certain books that were being widely read, and saying how much he wished that, instead of criticising every thing new, parents would sympathetically follow the reading of their children, so as to be able to enter into their difficulties and interests. This is a point I will not dwell on at any length, but I do think that, in the surroundings of the home, the provision of good reading and the habit of steady systematic reading there, are most invaluable things. It is very rarely, I think, that you get children to settle down to reading, as they ought to do, if they have not acquired the habit before being sent to school.

We must realize something of the responsibilities that we place upon these men and women to whom we send our children, men and women from whom we expect so much. So many things are required; they must have character, they must have sympathy, they must have tact. No mere even-handed, but "wooden," laddling out of punishments will suffice for a born teacher. He must be perfectly just, but he needs Nelson's blind eye on many an occasion.

Then one thing further. In sending our children away to school we do want the teachers there to be able to father and to mother them. The more we can arrange so that in our schools it is possible to have a fair number of married teachers holding positions there, the better I am sure it will be for those schools. We know the unselfishness with which unmarried teachers work, year in and year out in our schools. What I am saying suggests not the slightest reflection on them; but I do feel, the older I get, the wider sympathies that result from a happy married life, one's sympathies expanding in a way that can hardly do when you are simply "playing for your own hand." You may be very sure that married teachers will not develop selfishness, and they will not have less tenderness for others because of having children of their own whose weaknesses and wants will appeal to them so nearly. Besides, if they have children of their own, they will get educated by them, a very important thing. The position of teachers is something like clergymen in some ways; they say to this boy, "Go," and he goeth—or at least he had better go generally, and to another "Come," and he cometh; till really there is a danger—and I am sure any of us who have been teachers would be the first to own it—that like the Bellman in the Hunting of the Shark, we may come to the conclusion that whatever we may say three times must be true. Now I am perfectly certain that no sensible woman, the wife of a teacher, would allow her husband to be under that misapprehension for a matter of five minutes.

It is evident from the facts we have had before us that the people to whom we entrust the teaching of our children need to be perfect paragons. I hope I shall not be offending if I venture to say a word about their remuneration.

It is not sufficient that our teachers should be merely at least as well paid as other assistant teachers, nor can we be content merely to take our pace from others. Friends were once ahead of the rest of their rank in education. They can only regain the lead, which I am afraid there is no question that they have lost, and having regained it, maintain it, by having the very best of teaching in their schools. An appeal to commercial instincts, or "bread-and-butter" instincts, as they are called, I hate, but there is no need to overlook the fact that your best educated boy is worth more commercially as well as a citizen. For our teachers no deanery or bishopric waits; the profits incident to the position of a house-master in a great public school are not for them; they are giving of their best, but are building up no "good will" to be realized for their families, no share in partnership profits to be received when their grip on the active work of their business or profession relaxes through age. Our great industrial concerns, our government offices, have their retiring pensions to which the workers on their staffs look forward, but in but one English Public Friends' School is there the nucleus of such a pension or retiring fund. To do the best possible work our teachers' minds must be free from gnawing anxieties. Does the struggling clerk, the small shopkeeper, or the weekly wage earner grudge the additional expense that must come upon him if the upward tendency in teachers' salaries is continued, aye, and accelerated? Yet for none is it more important that their children shall have the very best that can be provided in the way of teaching and training, widening the scope of their influence and their usefulness. Selfishness is not the besetting sin of the great majority of parents: whatever they have been themselves they wish that their children at any rate shall have advantages that were not theirs, in the way of culture and width of outlook on the world. If, as is possible enough, the worry and strain of the parents in endeavoring to make both ends meet has told on their children's dispositions, the last thing in the world you could wish is that a worried, irritable teacher should be provided to make bad worse in dealing with an irritable child—irritable, perhaps, through no fault of its own. We must make the pay of our teachers more adequate. I am very certain of this, that the better paid staffs will never lose sympathy and touch with the hard-pressed parents. The more the parents come into contact with the teachers, the more these will be able to realize, as they do not always have an opportunity of doing, how keen the struggle is in some homes to provide the means for education, and how great is the responsibility that rests upon them as teachers to do their very best for the children that are sent to them, sometimes at the cost of great self-denial on the part of the parents.

We are a very remarkable nation. Our extravagance and our economy are alike amazing. . . . Are we sure that we sufficiently care about the education for which we are responsible, as none else are—the education of those who are brought under our influence? Are we going to drop back in educational matters, or are we going to move forward?

YOUNG FRIENDS' ASSOCIATIONS.

NEWTOWN, PA.—An interesting meeting of the Newtown Junior Friends was held on Fourth-day evening at the home of Morrell Smith. Bernard Walton conducted the meeting and Julia C. Eyre acted as secretary. Thirty members attended the meeting.

Hanna T. Smith read the opening paper on "The Young Friend in Social Life." She said that the young people of the Society of Friends to-day are as fond of social pleasures as those of any other denomination and it is right that they should be so. Amusements and sports are conducive to the best interests of healthy society. The only danger in amusements is in improper environment or in carrying them to excess. While young Friends to-day participate in card-playing and dancing, they are not reaping the results of excess or bad associations.

Lloyd R. Wilson, whose subject was "The Young Friend in Civic Life," said that in civic life to-day, Friends of all ages are conspicuous by their absence. At first thought this may seem a point in their favor, considering the condition of politics, but in reality, it is much to their discredit. It does not speak well for the high moral standards, which have been universally associated with the name of Quaker, that their influence has not been more keenly felt in politics. It is an undisputed fact, however, that the young Friend of the present decade has a duty in this direction, a debt which he owes to his country, his religious society and to himself, as a citizen worthy of the name. It has been said that in the City of Brotherly Love, where Friends are as numerous as anywhere, and where they have flourished as merchants, they will not take an active part toward purifying the city civics for fear of suffering financial loss in business, during the general upheaval that would follow a change in the machine rule. The true Friend, however, as George Walton remarked, should be willing to face such an upheaval for the sake of the city.

Harry K. Eyre read a paper on "The Young Friend in Religious Life," in which he said that it is only a late year, since the early times of the founders, that the young people of the society have taken any active part in the religious meetings. This has been brought about through the First-day schools and the Friends' associations.

Sara C. Wilson thought that as yet young Friends did not compare favorably with the young of other churches in regard to religious consecration.

George Walton said that this was most likely to be the case in rural districts. In towns or cities where the young Friends are continually meeting people of different views, the interest in their own society is stimulated. In the Young Men's Christian Association of the University of Pennsylvania, he finds that the Quakers make as good workers as any of the other young men. All the subjects were freely discussed.

Martha C. Wilson made a report of the missionary committee, which was empowered to make use of the funds of the association by donations of literature and money to Friends' Missions in Philadelphia.

The next meeting on Twelfth month 30th, will be held at the home of Martha C. Wilson. A holiday program will be prepared.—[Doylestown Intelligencer.]

QUAKERTOWN, PA.—An interesting meeting of the Young Friends' Association was held at the home of Edward Shaw, Eleventh month 19th. At the opening of the meeting the president read the 90th Psalm. A letter was then read from the Secretary of the "Committee on the Advancement of Young Friends' Association work." This was considered, and we shall be glad to avail ourselves of the help therein extended. One new name was proposed for membership. Emma Shaw, one of the delegates who attended the General Conference held at Wilmington, gave a very good report. The first on the literary program was history reading by Ella H. Kinsey, "The Life of Benjamin Hallowell." E. Irene Meredith read from Whittier, "The Quaker of the Olden Time." Eleanor Foulke read a chapter from "The Kingship of Self-control," by William George Jordan, on "The Red Tape of Duty."

"Love is the wondrous angel of life that rolls away all the stones of sorrow and suffering from the pathway of duty."

Another reading was given by Hannah M. Penrose entitled "Suspicion of One's Fellows." Lizzie M. Strawn read a poem from the FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER, "The Voice of the Fire." Current Topics of interest were given by Sada R. Johnson. A number of beautiful sentiments were given and after a silence the meeting adjourned to meet the 17th of Twelfth month at the home of Eleanor Foulke. A. B. R., Cor. Sec.

PLYMOUTH, PA.—The regular meeting of Young Friends' Association was held Sixth-day evening, Eleventh month 27th. The president, Helen C. Livezey, being absent, Benjamin Smith was appointed to take her place.

After the minutes of last meeting were read and approved, the report of the committee to nominate officers for the coming year was read. They offered the following names: president, William W. Ambler; vice-president, Lewis Mammell; secretary, Sara S. Haines; executive committee, Benjamin Smith, Lydia G. Webster, Caroline W. Buckman and Benjamin Tomlinson, which were united with by the meeting, and the new officers took their places.

A report of the Conference held at Wilmington was given by Annie Davis. Sara S. Haines opened the literary exercises for the evening by reciting "Tob's Monument," which was followed by Lydia Webster who read a very interesting paper on current topics. Bertha Paul read a short account of the life of Lucretia Mott. The subject for discussion, "Should character or mental training be our first consideration in our systems of education?" was opened by Lewis Mammell, who read a very conclusive paper in favor of making character our first consideration. An interesting discussion followed, which was participated in by Benjamin Tomlinson, Benjamin Smith, Wallace Mammell and others. Watson K. Phillips then read a short selection on "The Cultivation of the Voice." After a few moments of silence, the meeting adjourned to meet First month 1st, 1904. SARA S. HAINES, Sec.

MANSFIELD, N. J.—The Mansfield Young Friends' Association met at the home of Anna B. and Robert Taylor on Eleventh month 7th, with twenty-two members in attendance, who responded to their names at roll call, some with appropriate quotations.

The literary exercises were opened by Sara A. Biddle reading a portion of the Discipline on "Meetings for Worship." Anna C. Scott read an interesting sketch from the Journal of Thomas Chalkley after which the question, "What do Friends understand by 'The Judgment to Come'?" was very thoughtfully prepared by Cyrus S. Moore, who said: "Immortality, resurrection, judgment to come and Heaven are governed by Divine Law whose Maker is God. Friends understand that there has been a resurrection and judgment, that we are twofold beings, possessed with body and spirit, one returns to earth, the other to its Divine Giver: this is resurrection, ascension, judgment to come and life beyond the grave. Read the Commandments, study the Acts of the Apostles, learn the example and precepts of our Saviour and trust in God, then will we be Friends indeed to all of this world and the world to come."

After some interesting Current Topics were read by Hannah W. Black, the meeting adjourned to meet Twelfth month 5th at the home of Elizabeth A. Scott.

M. A. T., Sec. Pro. Tem.

NEW YORK.—A regular meeting of Young Friends' Association of New York and Brooklyn was held in New York Eleventh month 22d, 1903.

Our delegation to attend the General Conference of Friends' Associations consisted of Henry M. Haviland, Edward B. Rawson and Harry A. Hawkins. They reported an attendance at the meeting-house in Wilmington, Del., of some three hundred or four hundred delegates and other interested ones, and that the papers presented and the discussion following the reading of them, showed an alertness and interest that was most encouraging. They evidently enjoyed the occasion very much.

All section reports due at this meeting were deferred in order to give more time for the paper of the evening, which was the first one of a course planned for the season, on the great ethical teachers of the world. It was by Mary S. McDowell, on "Socrates," whom she called the first Quaker. The paper was much appreciated and glittered with quotations from this justly honored leader of the world's best thought.

A very general and interesting discussion followed the reading of the paper. The Association then adjourned to meet in Brooklyn Twelfth month 13th.

LITERARY NOTES.

THE NEW EDITION OF WEBSTER.

"WHEN Noah Webster brought out the first edition of his American Dictionary of the English Language, in 1828, it contained twelve thousand words never collected in any dictionary before. In 1841 Webster published his second edition, enlarged by several thousand words, and the last considerable labor of his life was the addition of "some hundreds" more in 1843. Every addition that has appeared since his death has repeated the same tale, and it is almost incredible that only ten years after Webster's International Dictionary was first given to the public, it should be necessary to add a Supplement of five thousand new words. (Webster's International Dictionary of the English Language. New Edition with Supplement of New Words. Springfield, Mass.: G. C. Merriam Company.)

"An examination of this Supplement is most instructive. One cannot even turn the pages and look at the illustrations without being impressed with the evidences of rapid growth in our knowledge of fishes and insects, birds and plants. Another class of illustrations suggests the extent to which we have become citizens of the whole world, familiar with dress and customs in every land and every climate. . . . Whatever we may think about new words that must be called slang, pure and simple, it is a pleasure to get an authoritative account of certain dialect words that recent literature is making familiar, and to recover now and then an ancient word, full of a Chaucerian virtue, that had fallen into obsolescence before the revival of interest in the early makers of English.

"A word should be said, too, in praise of the newly revised Pronouncing Gazetteer and Pronouncing Biographical Dictionary, the latter of which now contains ten thousand names.

"Altogether this edition of the International Dictionary is so full in its vocabulary; so accurate and clear in its definitions; so admirably arranged for rapid use; and so largely equipped with auxiliary aids, that the more one uses it, the more satisfying he finds it."—[Atlantic Monthly for Twelfth month.]

In an elaborately illustrated article in The Popular Science Monthly for Twelfth month, Gilbert H. Grosvenor, editor of The National Geographic Magazine, describes the tetrahedral kites of Dr. Alexander Graham Bell. He says in conclusion that Dr. Bell has now reached the point where the flying machine is no longer problematical. It is simply a question of time necessary to put things together. Whether the first flying machine carrying a man is built by him at his laboratory in Beinn Bhreagh is probably immaterial to him, but the chances are that if some one else does not build a successful machine within the next year or two he will have a flying machine of his own by that time. Other articles in the number are on "The Salmon and Salmon Streams of Alaska," by President David Starr Jordan; "The Storm Center in the Balkans," "The Growth of Rural Population," by Frank T. Carlton.

In Harper's Magazine Mark Twain tells in his own imitable way the story of a dog that was a better Christian than his scientific owner; no lover of dogs can read it with unmoistened eyes. Mary E. Wilkins Freeman contributes a story, "The Revolt of Sophia Lane," which should be read by all thoughtless people who give Christmas and wedding presents that can be of no possible use to the recipients.

In Scribner's Magazine there is an article by Edward Penfield, describing Holland as seen from the stern of a canal boat, with delightfully quaint illustrations in color. One of the signs that attracted the writer's attention was, "L. V. D. Zwann, Morgen Wekker," this signifies that the man named will, for a paltry sum, leave his bed in the frosty hours of early morning and arouse his slumberous clients. The author wonders who, in that somnolent land, wakes the Morgen Wekker.

There is no more delightful magazine for the lovers of good literature than the Atlantic Monthly. The issue for this month contains the usual store of readable articles. The recent news of conflict with the Moros will give additional interest to Major R. L. Bullard's paper concerning them, for while building roads on their archipelago he had a good opportunity to study the characteristics of the people. Theodore F. Munger, in discussing some immediate questions that pertain to the church, quotes an English clergyman who, when asked at Northfield "how he got along with truth and evolution," replied, "Truth and evolution: evolution is truth."

Those who are interested in the boy problem will find food for thought in Alice Katharine Fallows' article in this month's Century, "Temptations to be Good." Jacob A. Riis, in his "Children of the People," pictures the fruitful vision of a young clergyman in the Pennsylvania mountains, one midsummer Sabbath, twenty-seven years ago. Because of the unfolding of his vision nine starved waifs of the great city came to the mountains the next week and the Fresh Air charity was born.

Among the good things in St. Nicholas are "President Washington's Turkey Dinner," and an illustrated article, "The Signs of Old London," by Julian King Colford. "Nature and Science for Young Folks" tells of the paths made by creatures of the woods and fields when the snow falls, and of an elephant that was afraid of a mouse.

AN OLD BANK'S NEW DEPARTURE.

THOSE who have had their attention called to "banking by mail" by seeing the advertisement of the Old Bowery Savings Bank in our columns will be interested in the following from Printer's Ink for Eleventh month 11th:

The Bowery Savings Bank, of New York City, is the largest savings institution in the world. Seventy years old, it has more than 140,000 depositors, with present deposits of about $83,000,000 and assets of nearly $93,000,000. The president of this institution, William H. S. Wood, upon his election as president a year ago, began an advertising campaign for the Bowery Savings Bank, with a view to extending the institution's mail banking department. The primary purpose of this advertising is to get deposits, but the advertising also has an altruistic purpose. Banking by mail has been taken up by banks in many parts of the country. In some quarters there is a disposition to bid on rates of interest, while all the banks are corporate, operating without the safeguards that are thrown around New York savings institutions. President Wood does not assert that any of these advertising banks are weak. The "Old Bowery's" publicity is not intended to restrict other banks in any way, but simply to extend the sphere of influence of one of the strongest institutions in the world.

New York State has the safest savings banks in the world. Some explain their functions by referring to them as charitable institutions. Under the State laws savings banks are money-making enterprises, and commonly directed by men of high business ability. But the money is made for the depositors. There are no stockholders, and officers receive nominal salaries. Profits are paid out in the shape of dividends to depositors, and these are equivalent to interest at from three to four per cent.

Every possible safeguard is thrown around New York savings banks. Neither trustees nor officers can borrow from them, and all their investments are ruled by statute. They are not permitted to invest in securities other than United States bonds, the bonds of certain States and cities, first mortgages on real estate in New York State, bonds of certain specified railroads. Only a certain percentage of the funds can be invested in any one direction. These restrictions are imposed by few other States, and in no other are savings banks carried on so wholly for the benefit of depositors by public-spirited men who act as officers and trustees.

How carefully the Bowery Savings Bank looks after the welfare of depositors is shown in the system that applies to large withdrawals. Any sum of more than $1,000 drawn by a depositor is referred to the president or comptroller for approval, and in each instance the depositor is asked to state what the money is to be used for. Frequently it is learned that depositors are taking out savings to speculate on margins in Wall street, knowing practically nothing of financial matters. How a depositor spends money is no legal concern of the bank, and in a general way none of its business, and money is paid without hesitation if explanation is refused. But by this bit of precaution the Bowery's depositors are saved tens of thousands of dollars yearly. Hardly a day goes by but some misguided man or woman is invited into President Wood's office to listen to a kindly, fatherly talk about stock speculations and Wall street—which is no place for a poor man. Of all the hundreds who have been asked to state the purpose for which they were withdrawing money only a single one has refused the information; every one has left the president's office, most gratefully thanking him for his kindly interest.

CURRENT EVENTS.

NEWS comes to us of fighting in Sulu, one of the Philippine Islands, in which several hundred natives were killed or wounded, while the Americans, under General Wood, lost but two or three men. This calls attention to the Bates agreement, entered into by the United States Government, with the Sultan of Sulu, which provided that slavery and polygamy should not be interfered with in that island. It is now claimed that the authority of the Sultan of Sulu is merely nominal, that anarchy has existed in the island, and that a force of 500 soldiers would be sufficient to keep the peace. A bill to abrogate the Bates agreement and abolish slavery in the Philippines has been introduced in Congress by a Representative from Tennessee.

ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL BRISTOW has made a report on the postal scandals in which he states that the perpetrators of the frauds have received between $300,000 and $400,000 as their share of the plunder. In consequence of the discoveries, four employees of the Government resigned, 14 were removed, and 44 indictments have been found, involving 31 persons, ten of whom have been connected with the postal service. President Roosevelt, in a memorandum accompanying the report, praises Bristow's work and scathingly arraigns the principal offenders, Tyrer, Barrett, Machen and Beavers.

INTERESTING as showing how we look to European nations, is the course that a German newspaper maps out for events in America. The National Zeitung (Berlin) thinks it likely, that the Central American States will be absorbed by their great northern neighbor or fall under her influence. It wonders if Mexico and South America in general will be able to escape their fate. The opinion is also expressed that the United States would reach the limits of its possibilities when it had usurped the sovereignty of the American continent, just as the real Rome ceased to exist when the Romans became lords of the world.

"The imperialist idea necessarily involves a reconstitution of the Union. A federation of States is not capable of an unlimited extension, nor can it exercise dominion over territories the extent of which excels its own. The United States henceforth will need legions and ships of war in both oceans. With militarism a new element will be introduced in the Republic, which has hitherto been exclusively civilian. The imperialists now see only the obverse of the medal; it is hoped that the reverse may not show them too late that all human things have limitations."

THE reforms proposed by Austria and Russia have been accepted by Turkey, after more than a month of delay. The point most strongly objected to by Turkey was that providing for the appointment of two (one Austrian and one Russian) civil agents, or "assessors," who are to accompany the Inspector General of Macedonia everywhere. These assessors are to direct the Inspector-General's attention to the needs of the Christian population, to report to him the abuses of the local authorities, to transmit corresponding proposals to the Ambassadors at Constantinople, and to report to their Governments on everything that happens in the country. To assist these agents secretaries and dragomans are to be appointed, who will execute the assessors' orders, and who will be empowered to go on tours, to question the inhabitants of Christian villages, to watch over the local authorities, etc. The Porte must instruct the local authorities to afford all facilities to the agents in the accomplishment of their mission. Turkey has accepted the reforms only after the strongest pressure has been applied, and the acceptance is qualified by the reservation that everything calculated to humiliate Turkey is to be avoided.

The German budget for 1904 is said to show extreme economy. The naval estimates for permanent expenditure call for $19,965,500, an increase of $1,311,673. This item includes $5,194,350 for maintenance, an increase of $404,000. The regular expenditure is estimated at $21,507,250, an increase of $380,000. This includes the first installments for the construction of two battleships, one large cruiser, three small cruisers and one torpedo boat. The extraordinary expenditure for the navy is estimated at $10,137,000, an increase of $702,000. At this writing, the portion relating to the army has not been published.

The great strike in Chicago of the street railway men came to an end on the 26th. The basis on which the settlement was reached is a complete victory for the company as far as the original demands of the men are concerned. The only important concession made by the company was an agreement to reinstate all the strikers, including the outside unions, who went out in sympathy with the trainmen, with the exception of those who resorted to violence during the trouble.

The Cuban Congress has created embassies at Rome and at Berlin to be in charge of secretaries receiving instructions from the Cuban Minister at Paris and London respectively.

"WHAT is the difference between hens and poultry, pop?"

"Why, hens, my son, are things that belong to our neighbors; poultry is something a man owns himself."—[Yonkers Statesman.]

NEW uses of the telephone are constantly being discovered: It is said that a certain Cadiz lady, wishing to visit a neighbor recently, pulled the baby's crib in front of the telephone, opened the receiver, and calmly told "Central" that she was going out to visit a certain neighbor, and that if baby waked up while she was gone Central would please call her up at the neighbor's. —[Cadiz Republican.]

AN official of the British Museum relates the story of an elderly country woman who made a visit to London especially to see him.

She carried a parcel, and exclaimed:

"I've got two o' 'em!"

"Two of what?" inquired the professor.

"Two 'awk's eggs," replied the woman. "I'm told they're worth a thousand pounds apiece."

The professor, much interested, looked at the eggs. "These are not auk's eggs," he said.

"They are 'awk's eggs," said his visitor. "My son Joe found 'em."

"The kind of eggs which are so valuable," he said, gently, "are the eggs of an extinct bird called the auk—a-u-k."

"Oh, hauk!" said the woman. "I'll pay out that 'Ery 'Obhouse, a stold me it was 'awk's eggs you wanted." And she went away.

L.

DEEP humility is a strong bulwark, and as we enter into it, we find safety and true exaltation.

JOHN WOOLMAN.

FOR US.

If we have not learned that God's in man,
And man in God again;
That to love thy God is to love thy brother,
And to serve the Lord is to serve each other,—
Then Christ was born in vain!

If we have not learned that one man's life
In all men lives again,
That each man's battle, fought alone,
Is won or lost for every one,—
Then Christ hath lived in vain.

If we have not learned that death's no break
In life's unceasing chain;
That the work in one life well begun,
In others is finished, by others is done,—
Then Christ hath died in vain!

If we have not learned of immortal life,
And a future free from pain;
The kingdom of God in the heart of man,
And the living world on Heaven's plan,—
Then Christ arose in vain.

—Charlotte Perkins Gilman.

IN MEMORY OF ISAAC H. HILLBORN.

Words spoken at the funeral service held in Race Street Meeting-house, Philadelphia, Eleventh month 23d, 1903.

MARGARET P. HOWARD: . . . A brother beloved has been removed, whose chief and largest concern was that he might be helpful to as many as he could to find their consciousness to the nearness of the divine spirit; to feel the touch of that spirit upon their own; to realize the sense of requirement, and also, that with every requirement came the strength to perform what was required. . . .

Ezra Fell: . . . He spent his life in the work of helping to elevate mankind to the standard of Christ. O, be faithful. We all have something to do in this world; we are all called here, not to be idle, not to pass our time in great pleasures—O, no; but we are placed here to prepare for that eternal kingdom that has no ending, and we will find in this our greatest reward, not only when we come to lay down our life here, but every day we will realize that we are coming nearer and nearer to the fountain of life and that by and by we will be permitted to enter into those pearly gates where there is rest and peace prepared for the righteous from the foundations of the world.

Sarah T. Linvill: . . . Our common loss unites us in deep, heartfelt sorrow; but we sorrow not for him. He did his work in the daytime, and he has received the "well done"; but O, we sorrow for ourselves. May we indeed so lean upon the arm of divine strength that we shall know a quickening of power—know a renewal of life; that we shall be able to perform the duties that shall come to us. As this dear brother hovered for weeks upon the border-land, that strong, beautiful faith that he lived and preached so sustained him that he was able to look into the beyond with clear, spiritual perception; and his path did indeed shine more and more unto the perfect day; and of that love—O, that love that has drawn us all so closely to him—even it has reached far and wide; and on one occasion when the end seemed to be so near he said to me, in all the earnestness of a dedicated soul, "I want this message borne unto the world: Heaven is big; God is good; we shall meet again."

David Newport: . . . "And every gate thereof was one pearl"—one thing. Now I think that thought was the burden of our brother's life and ministry. I have known him intimately for many years; on the occasion of a visit with me to the public institutions of the city prisons and otherwise (I think it was about the first of his appearance in the ministry); and then recently with me in the same direction in the last two years. He was a man that was moved by a noble enthusiasm for truth. He could say, as one of old—the Blessed One of old—said, "For this end was I born; for this cause came I into the world—to bear witness to the truth"; and he bore witness to the simplicity of the one thing; he was eminently a preacher of that one thing, the same that Jesus spoke of in reference to those who had gone before him: "And they shall all be taught of God, as all the prophets have said."

. . . As he grew older and advanced in life, only two or three years ago he told me of the edification and breadth of view that he had from the perusal of the works of Emerson, especially in relation to the Oversoul. His mind enlarged upon this thought and upon this theme, and his spirit and walk in life gave evidence of it; and in looking at this good man's life I have thought how poor and weak and flimsy are the glories and honors of this world—its emoluments, its riches. . . .

Joel Borton: . . . "For I am already being offered, and the time of my departure is come. I have fought the good fight; I have run my course; I have kept the faith. There is henceforth laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, will give to me in that day; not to me only, but to all those that love his appearance."

This experience of our beloved Paul has seemed to me some way to accord with the departure of our dear friend, of whom of a truth it might be said: "I am already being offered," as seemed to be his experience in the last few days of his life. He knew the time of his departure was at hand; it had come. And he in that strength and faith and noble manhood of his, never wavered, but awaited it with calmness and deliberation, anticipating it, desiring it. Truly he fought a good fight, and not without his trials and disappointments, sorrows and temptations in life, was he; yet he met them bravely and truly, quietly and with assurance; scarcely ever did we hear him speak of them; but with that eternal faith he rose above them and fought the good fight. . . .

His last words to me only a few days ago were, "I have nothing in my way. Everything is clear; I am ready and only waiting." The silver cord was being loosened, the golden bowl broken. . . .

. . . Ah, my friends, . . . the memory of him will come so keenly to us at the assembling of our annual gathering in the spring—to those of us who yet remain, when we remember him as presiding officer who has done it so faithfully and well; who has laid down his pen at times and asked that he might be one with us and given forth the words—just the words, too, that we needed and felt to comfort and to straighten out matters. In the First-day School—a work in which he has been one of the first promoters—we shall miss him; in his own meeting, where he was so tenderly and truly beloved, and where they have sustained other losses so recently by the removal of dear and faithful ones—how keenly it will be felt. In this present place in which we are assembled, as he has stood in these galleries from time to time and year to year and handed forth the loving messages to the school children that have helped and cheered and blessed them—how they and all will miss him! Everywhere he was known he will be missed. It seems to me, in summing it all up, we will say in the words of the little text we have heard him take, that his mission, as that of the Master on earth, was "in going about doing good." . . .

Mary Travilla: . . . In memory I go back to a few months ago, when it was my privilege to spend a few days with him in sight of the eternal hills in the month of June among the roses; he then was attending a series of meetings, and I had the opportunity of noting the effect of his powerful sermons upon the minds and hearts of his hearers; but I also had the opportunity of noting the old-fashioned grace of courtesy that was his. It was almost like an old-fashioned art, sometimes almost forgotten, in these modern days of our hurry-and-scurry life. My young friends here present will agree with me—how he could touch our hearts. He seemed indeed as if he had not forgotten the days of his youth; therefore, he was in sympathy with your ambitions, with your hopes and with your life of joy and sorrow. On our return journey from this series of meetings that we attended I had the opportunity again to note. We had to take an accommodation train, and for several hours we journeyed together; he sat near the door; it was a holiday, and therefore the conductor was more than busy with his large crowd of passengers; and it was Isaac H. Hillborn's old-fashioned grace of courtesy which he extended to the lame and the halt and the blind on that trip. You know those outstretched arms—how often, in speaking of nature and the spiritual to some of us, he extended them like a benediction among us; and he went out on the platform and would reach down to the old woman with bundles; helped the lame boy with his mother; spoke the word of encouragement to the old Friend; and he forgot not the wife and the companion by his side; the courtesy and the grace of a lover-husband were blended; and when we reached Broad Street I could not leave him without saying, "Isaac, thy preaching touched our hearts and our lives; but the evidence of thy practicing has even been a greater sermon to me."

Samuel Jones: . . . We will remember—often, almost, some of us, as the day returns—this spirit of love and the pouring forth of those messages which seemed to touch and tender us; but, my friends, as we turn from these—turn our back to the things which he taught us and the example which he set up, we will not show our love. O, then, let all of us endeavor to press forward that our lives may be filled, that our example may be bright and shining as his was; and as we have been helped by it, may others be helped by us; and as we experience this, then will we be able to exclaim, with one formerly, "O Lord, thou wilt shew me the path of life; in thy presence there is fulness of joy, and on thy right hand there are pleasures forevermore."

John J. Cornell: . . . A few weeks ago I sat by his bedside, only a few days after he had been stricken, and he knew his case was hopeless, in conversation with him and in the feeling of heart and outflowing of soul with soul. It was an hour I shall long remember: The calmness, the sweetness that even then he manifested in looking toward the change; and the final, parting words: "I am ready; nothing in my way"; it was the result of his perfected life, beloved friends; it was not reached in a moment; there had been trials through that life that had purified and perfected, and herein lies the importance of the lesson of the present occasion: We look around us; we say in our hearts, "Who can fill his place? Where is the man or woman that can take that mantle that has fallen from him?" And yet we cannot distrust the power of the all-loving Father to raise up other standard-bearers who shall carry forward the work further than he. . . .

Matilda E. Janney: A few words I must say. I stood beside him in the gallery year after year, and worked shoulder to shoulder with him in our First-day School. I loved him; I trusted him; I had faith in him. But, dear friends, our friend has asked who shall stand in his place? No one will stand in Isaac Hillborn's place; but each one of us can stand in our own place. We can go forward to-day; this grief is in our hearts, but we can go forward, brave and strong; we can fill up the ranks behind him and do the work that the Father is calling each one of us to do to-day; and you, dear young people, who loved him so, who loved to hear the words fall from his lips, who loved to feel the grasp of his hand and see the smile upon his face—will you not to-day work still a little more? Help still a little more; try to make the way a little plainer and clearer for those that don't see it quite so clear? This is what he did; this is how he helped us. He tried so hard to make the way clear for us that we might step forth, be strong and brave to do the work that he knew the Master was calling each one of us to do. . . .

Charles E. Hires: . . . This multitude is gathered here because of the love and reverence that we have for Isaac Hillborn; it is because our heart-strings are broken over the grief and sorrow that we feel at his death. I well remember the last visit he paid to my house. Out on the lawn he picked a sprig from one of the trees where the bud was swelling and almost ready to burst, and, bringing it into the house, commented upon the life it contained—spoke of the seeds in the ground and that, ere dying, they would put forth their life in the spring. . . .

Isaac Hillborn not only prayed and thanked God for his clothing—for a home and friends; but he thanked Him more for all the great pleasure and privilege he had of burying in the human heart and childish hearts that have gathered here the seed that will ripen in the unborn years to come. . . .

Samuel S. Ash: This service has been long, and has its value, and the time is near to close it; let us bow our heads in fervent supplication to our heavenly Father.

Our heavenly Father, thou art taking away—breaking up the old landmarks, removing our earthly props; O teach us to lean solely upon thee; draw us so near to perfect resignation—so near to perfect acquiescence in thy will, that we may be enabled to bear all things. We reverently ask of thee, not because of anything that we have done nor because of anything that we may hope to do, but for thy mercy's sake, O Lord, forgive us and receive us. Amen!

CLOSING INCIDENTS IN THE LIFE OF ISAAC H. HILLBORN.

At the request of a number of friends I send these extracts from my journal of the last sermon by our revered friend, Isaac H. Hillborn, and my last interview with him. These were so touching and remarkable that I recorded them on the same days.

It was on the 4th of Tenth month, 1903, at Seventeenth and Girard Avenue Friends' Meeting, in the same building where twenty-two years ago he first appeared in the ministry, that Isaac delivered his last sermon.

He spoke for half an hour, with a strong voice, but was evidently weak. He asked for a glass of water while speaking, partaking of it three times. He said:

"The law and the gospel are often quoted and often confounded. There is a distinct difference.

The law is only a condition and not competent to go farther than its limitations; while the gospel is the active and unlimited agency. It is not confined to any rigid rules, but because of the spirit of truth it knows no limitations.

"Moses could give the law, but there it ended. It was for Jesus to give the gospel. He did not discard the law, but used it and carried it out in its fullness and perfected it by the spirit. Moses went as far as he could for the time and the conditions of the law, while Jesus went far beyond, meeting not only the conditions of the law but the claims of humanity and the revelations of duty to the Father."

It was on the 22d of this same month, while Isaac was bedfast that, holding my hand during the entire interview, he said: "I am patiently waiting for any change that may come. I am very comfortable, and do not desire any delay of any treatment that is thought best. I am perfectly satisfied either way. It is a rest to me to be here. I have had visions, manifestations and messages wonderfully clear and comforting, that I never had before, and never supposed it was possible to have." "I believe faith is a gift." At this point I asked him if every one could acquire this faith and be thus comforted. He replied, after a few moments of silence and evidently of reflection: "Yes, these openings and communications can come to all, but can only come to the prepared soul." ALFRED H. LOVE

Philadelphia, Eleventh month 30th, 1903.

A TYPICAL FRIEND OF THE OLDEN TIME.

(Concluded from last week.)

On his return to Philadelphia, still under twenty years of age, with a balance of four hundred dollars, he found himself possessed of the means of buying all the books he wanted. A vacancy had occurred in the mathematical department of Friends' Academy, on Fourth Street, and he made application for it. Here his friend Ellicott was again serviceable by giving such a good report of him that the appointment was speedily made, and he resumed his teaching of mathematical science.

Notwithstanding his youth, he experienced no difficulty in maintaining proper order without resorting to corporal punishment, although the prevalent opinion was strongly in favor of an adherence to the old and severe modes of discipline. He doubted the necessity or propriety of the use of the rod, and his repugnance to it was such that he determined rather than resort to it to adopt the alternative of dismissal. His manner was always firm and dignified, and he impressed his pupils with respect for his good opinion as well as for his talents and attainments. His habitual and conscientious accuracy and reverence for truth exercised a wholesome influence over the minds of his pupils, and availed more to suppress the vice of lying than the gravest moral lectures. His habit was to confide implicitly in the statements of his boys, when he did not know them to be untrue, and the expression of that confidence was an irresistible appeal to their honor against its abuse. He expected them to be incapable of falsehood, and contributed largely towards making them so.

In the year 1798 Emmor Kimber, who was then teaching Friends' School in Pine Street, Philadelphia, invited him to his house, where he met, for the first time, Alice Jackson, of New Garden, Chester County, daughter of Isaac Jackson, and sister of Susan, wife of Emmor Kimber. This meeting was a fateful one, and resulted in his marriage to this singularly lovely and gifted woman, for whom he entertained an ideal reverence. There was perfect agreement between husband and wife in their religious opinions, and the harmony and peace resulting from mutual love and devotion. His admiration was unbounded, and she seems to have been entirely worthy of his highest estimation. In 1805 she began to speak in meetings for worship. Her beautiful gift was exercised in meekness and diffidence, and being in no haste to use it but only in obedience to a will superior to her own, she grew in it, and soon became a well approved and acceptable minister, and in a short period was recommended according to the usages of the Society of Friends.

Before his removal from Philadelphia, Enoch Lewis became deeply interested in the subject of slavery. During his life he never lost his interest, but continued to petition, to write, and to labor for the welfare of the oppressed in every available manner. The wrongs perpetrated upon the defenceless Indians also claimed his attention, and by his indefatigable exertions he was enabled to prevent intended frauds upon them, by which they would have been deprived of their just rights. His publications against slavery, against oaths, and other wrongs, are so numerous that in a resume like this it is impossible even to name them. Nor can his different scientific treatises be mentioned. Suffice it to say that with marvelous industry, and fertility of literary production, he permitted no opportunity of benefiting mankind to escape him in which he perceived an available opening.

In 1799 he was appointed teacher of mathematics at Westtown Boarding School, opened at that time. He remained there for seven years, and governed his pupils in accordance with his own views. His room was No. 22, and in that there was no resort to corporal punishment, although Westtown followed the general rule of flagellation for disobedience common at the time. A word or a look from him was sufficient to preserve order. There was no disobedience. All were anxious to get, in the order of their classes, into No. 22. He was incomparably the most accomplished teacher of the institution. In 1799 he was the only person within the limits of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting who could be procured to fill the office of teacher in a mathematical school. The seed then sown germinated and yielded largely. Of students who matriculate yearly at Yale and other colleges of the East none are so thoroughly instructed as those who now come from Pennsylvania. The influence of Westtown School on education in Chester and Delaware Counties has been very decided. A better informed population is seldom found than in those counties, many of his pupils having become accomplished teachers, diffusing the knowledge and enthusiasm obtained under the instruction of Enoch Lewis. The influence of his wife was scarcely less than his own. She mingled freely with the teachers and elder pupils of the female school, to many of whom she became attached, forming friendships which continued to strengthen to the end of her life, leaving memories which after more than half a century were still held precious by her survivors.

Early in the spring of 1808 he resigned his position at Westtown, and towards the close of that year opened a boarding school in New Garden. In this school his wife took a lively interest, and not unfrequently gave instruction in reading, writing and English grammar. "Her presence was always welcome to the pupils. Every face brightened whenever she entered the school room. Her elocution was exceedingly fine, her taste cultivated and accurate, her voice sweet and musical, and having a nice appreciation of her author, she never failed to delight and instruct by her reading as well as by her conversation. Under her care the large household was so ordered that everything seemed naturally to fall into its proper place. There was neither confusion nor haste; nothing in excess and nothing wanting. In the kitchen, school room, nursery or parlor, surrounded by her servants, conversing with or instructing the pupils, nursing the sick, or entertaining her friends, she always wore the same radiant look, the same cheerful and benignant mien, and was as much of a lady to her cook as to her most courtly visitor."

Whether as a son, husband or father, Enoch Lewis was all that can be expected of an elevated, refined and tender nature. As a Friend he was faithful in our most important testimonies. As a philanthropist he was untiring in his efforts to benefit others. As a teacher he was excelled by few or none. As a man and a Christian he was an example, and so he remains. His memoir closes with these few simple words: "Many men have lived more brilliant lives than Enoch Lewis, but rarely has any man lived a better one."

Alice Lewis, a daughter of Enoch Lewis, above mentioned, died in West Chester, Pa., on Eleventh month 22d, 1903, aged 83 years. She was a child well worthy of her honored father. Her long life was devoted to good works, her liberal spirit embracing all who needed her help. The Philadelphia Friend says of her: "She was possessed by nature of strong mental powers, which were improved by cultivation and strengthened by use. This beloved Friend also gave evidence of the work of Divine Grace in her heart by the uprightness, the humility, the patience and the love which marked her daily walk."

It is part of God's discipline with us to hide his throne in clouds of darkness. The office of faith is to hold fast to the fact that behind those clouds a loving Father dwells upon that throne.—[T. L. Cuyler.]

A MAN OF THE SPIRIT.¹

DURING the past two decades the literary series has been a prominent feature in the ever-increasing flood of books that confronts us. This has been especially true of biographies. We have had "men of letters" series, English and American; statesmen, inventors, capitalists, warriors and many others, and now the followers of spiritual religion are given an opportunity to welcome a series of biographies of "men of the Spirit." The series known as "The Temple Biographies" cannot be more easily described than by quoting from the editor's preface.

"The series will bring together studies in the lives of men who have, by common consent, achieved the greatness which belongs to character rather than to status or circumstances. . . . Personality . . . is now the chief interest of philosophy and may be regarded as also the mainspring of history. . . . In many of the men from whom great movements and ideas spring there is a certain quality easily recognizable to a practiced eye, but hard to define satisfactorily. . . . One aspect of this quality is described as 'inspiration'—especially in the case of the poet and prophet. The inspired personality is one in whom some hidden force, idea, or impulse becomes as it were an incandescent flame affording light to others; he 'concentrates, intensifies, brings to clear consciousness, and realizes more fully, feelings and ideas which are active all around him,' but which in him reach a higher intensity and reality than elsewhere. Such men are called by many names—they are saints, seers, prophets, poets, artists, discoverers, inventors, leaders of men. . . . Cromwell's name for them in his own time was 'men of the Spirit,' and this, with characteristic directness, emphasizes an important element in their common greatness; for amidst all the differences of form and environment in which their genius works, and whatever ecclesiastical organization may have served as a prop for their early development, biographical analysis shows that lives which appear to be different in every other respect may have close affinities in the springs of motive which make them potent and fruitful, and that these are of the sort commonly described as spiritual, inexhaustible in their nature and filimitable in their products. . . . (The) thoughts, feelings and ideas which we owe to . . . men who have this quality of genius, or inspiration, or insight, are indeed the main factors in human progress. And this is true whether their sphere be that of religion, or science, or art, or government, or commerce, or war. . . . The habit of dealing with the supreme facts and factors, which are spiritual, reacts on character in a way which makes these men humble, simple and sincere. . . .

"The idea of this series is to bring together lives which have this double aspect; on one side commanding interest for the service which they have rendered to their kind, and on the other respect for their achievement of character. . . . So far as this endeavor is successful, each volume of the series will contain an impression of a character, as well as a record of facts, and will be an interpretation rather than a criticism of its subject." The 330 pages of the biography of Mazzini are about equally divided between the narrative of his life and a keen and sympathetic analysis of his character and philosophy. There is much in it for the rather mature reader who delights in the study of human nature and the development of human character.

Mazzini's career began with Italy disunited and writing under the tyranny of many despots; his young manhood was spent in a period of social and political unrest, and he was fired with a vision of Italy freed, united, and leading the nations in uplifting progress.

A man of such generosity and tender-heartedness that the misery of his country called him from his life with books into a lifelong and ceaseless struggle to liberate and save his native land; a struggle which only bore its meagre fruitage in his declining years, a struggle which prematurely wore him out, a struggle that cost him the pains of shelterless exile, and for which he gave up comfort and home and love and all that most men call happiness. But the work of Mazzini the transcendentalist met only moderate success, and some of it was clearly without avail. When his united Italy came, it was a monarchy, not a republic, and its sordidness sorely cut the high-souled idealist. But work he must to the very last, and hardship was no hardship for him. For himself he knew that to look for happiness led imperceptibly but certainly to selfishness; that sacrifice was the one real virtue; that duty to God, humanity and country and all men was the only life for the true man.

Dissatisfied with churches, he shed his orthodoxy, but kept his faith, and was a religious and very spiritual man. To him religion was the "eternal, essential, indwelling element of life," and deep in the consciousness of each man lay the religious sense, . . . the innate desire to apprehend God.

Humble, unambitious, he felt his call from God. His words had the power of compelling their hearers to do likewise; his convictions had the power that commands; he was a man who imposed his beliefs and made disciples. Like many great leaders, he was a man of little power in scientific thought, in accurate reasoning, or careful arrangement and analysis of facts. Yet "he was able to be a great moralist because in a rare degree he had himself the moral sense, because the passion for righteousness had so penetrated all his being that he could speak and be understood on the deep things of God, had something in his own soul that found its way to other souls." His soul burned with love for his fellow men and desire for their progress. As a keen literary critic he criticized Byron and Goethe, "neither poet had the sense of the race; of man, redeemed by love and social service; of the new hope and power that would come as men learned to work together for the common end."

THE NEXT STEP IN THE REVIVAL OF QUAKERISM.

SOME brewers in England, who wanted to register as the trade mark for a brand of beer, the word "Quaker," were surprised, no doubt genuinely, when the Meeting for Sufferings of the Society of Friends entered a protest. They could not see, they said, how any one could be harmed by their using as a trade mark the picturesque and obsolete word "Quaker."

In an article in the "Atlantic Monthly," by Theodore T. Munger, the Congregational minister, an observant and thoughtful writer, we read: "The Friends . . . have nearly run their race, having borne clear witness to the eternal truth of the Spirit."

That a firm of brewers thinks the term "Quaker" obsolete does not mean that "Quakerism" is dying out; it is a case of pure ignorance. But this very ignorance is significant. That to a well-informed student of present-day religious conditions it looks as if the Friends have done their work, and run their race, is not a matter for controversy. The point is not whether the Society of Friends really is quiescent or whether it is an aroused and active body of religious workers. The point is that whatever signs we think we see among ourselves of a "revival of Quakerism," however active we may think we are in good works, however much we may suppose we are doing to make our testimonies tell in the world, here is a writer who is well acquainted with the religious conditions of the country (as his writings and the article quoted in particular show), who thinks the Friends have nearly run their race.

Friends are not impressing the world with their earnestness and activity in behalf of their testimonies, though they have in the past so impressed the world.

In our meetings there is spiritual life. But our neighbors do not know it. They think we sit for an hour once or twice a week just to keep our meetings up. If they knew what those meetings mean to us they would crowd to them. It is our business to let them know and we are not doing it. We abstain from the use of alcoholic drinks and are generally clear of frequenting places of harmful diversion; we are strongly in favor of peace, and altogether have a very important set of testimonies, and a few Friends at least in every neighborhood where we have a meeting, in some places a great many keep clear in regard to all badness, exert themselves in a good degree in active goodness and have a great deal of peace and comfort in truly spiritual lines. But too generally those about them see only the outside and have no idea of the source of the Friends' strength in living the good life. The Friend's inner experience and his meeting house and all the inward and outward helps to closer walk with God and right relation to his fellow-men, are too generally for himself alone. He does not share them with his fellows who happen not to have been born to them nor to have stumbled onto them.

Speaking of a meeting, once large, now small and nearly childless, but situated in the midst of a dense population largely non-churchgoing, a Friend, one of our leaders, expressed his sympathy for the Friends there; the meeting must of course pass away with the present generation, he said. It being suggested that the meeting has no reason to continue unless it can get into touch with the people who live right about the meeting house, he said, "Why, there are no Friends living right about the meeting-house now!"

Those who have been born Friends and those who have by some happy chance or other found out what the Society stands for and have had the courage to push their way into it, are conscious that there has been going on for some time now a distinct revival of religious activity among us and see very plainly that the young people of the Society are impressed, as formerly they did not seem to be, with the importance and somewhat with the responsibilities of their heritage. It is but slowly that it is dawning on us that this heritage is not our exclusive property. But it is dawning, and it will not be long till a meeting-house and a Friend or two in a neighborhood will not be a landmark and a relic merely, but a center from which may go out a word that the present age much needs.

A GREAT many exhortations are given on the value of "little things." Little things should receive attention, but not to the exclusion of the great. A man may get so busy counting his steps that he forgets where he is going. It is possible to waste life with trifles. Many failures are caused by a disregard for the relative value of things. Pleasure is put above progress, body above soul, material above spirit, time above eternity.—[Baptist Commonwealth.]

HUNT.—At Bedford Park, New York City, Eleventh month 12th, 1903, to B. Lawrence and Fannie Hunt, a son, who is named Lawrence Alexander Hunt.

SMITH.—In San Francisco, Cal., Fifth month 8th, 1903, to Henry C. and Lillian Troth Smith, a daughter, whose name is Elizabeth Claire Smith.

WATSON.—At Mozart, Bucks County, Pa., on Tenth month 6th, 1903, to James M. and Mabel W. Watson, a son, who is named Albert W. Watson.

DEATHS.

CHAPMAN.—On Eleventh month 17th, 1903, at Uxbridge, Ontario, Joseph Chapman, aged 72 years. His illness was one of much severe suffering, yet borne without a murmur, and ever careful for the rest and welfare of his dear children who cared for him so faithfully.

He was a life-long member of our Society, and ever ready in defense of its principles.

A loving father, a true husband and kind neighbor, and it was a touching scene when the dear aged mother (now 96), and a widow 54 years, had to be taken from the coffin's side, desiring so much to go with her boy who had been so good that she felt she could not spare him.

His remains were followed by a large concourse of relatives and friends to the place of meeting and burial, and the memories and impress of his virtues left a rich legacy for his wife and children.

GAUNT.—At the home of her son-in-law, George C. Tonkin, near Mullica Hill, N. J., Eleventh month 19th, 1903, Sarah E. Gaunt, in her 81st year. A member of Pilesgrove, N. J., Monthly Meeting.

HAMPTON.—At her home, near Waterloo, N. Y., Twelfth month 3d, 1903, of cerebral meningitis, Emma A. Hampton, daughter of John and Tamar Hampton, in the 58th year of her age. A birthright member of the Society of Friends, though isolated from the companionship of its members, she lived her life in the faith.

HUGHES.—At Newmarket, Ontario, Third-day, the 24th of Eleventh month, 1903, Amelia M. Hughes, aged 78. In her death our Society and the community has lost a true Friend and worthy neighbor, one who, according to circumstances and ability in life, was ever faithful by example and precept in the maintenance of that true Christian principle that knows no denominational prejudice, but is ready to accept and do good wherever opportunity offers, always manifesting a deep interest in the cause of temperance reform, a diligent attender of religious meetings as long as her health permitted.

Her home was rich in hospitable entertainment for all. A large circle of friends and acquaintances testified of their friendship and loss by their presence at the funeral, where the dear aged husband of 84 years was not able to attend, but wished his appreciation expressed for the kindness of their Orthodox Friends, who kindly offered their meeting house for the occasion, that all might be accommodated. W.

JEWETT.—At his home in Lincoln, Va., Eleventh month 23d, 1903, Joseph H. Jewett, in his 84th year. He was a native of Deer Creek, Md., but lived all the later years of his life in Lincoln, where he was widely known and highly respected for many virtues of mind and heart. A member of the other branch of Friends.

JONES.—Eleventh month 29th, 1903, Thomas Jones, in the 78th year of his age. A member of Pipe Creek Particular and Monthly Meeting, Maryland. He was a resident of Union Bridge, Md., and vicinity, since 1871, and, while visiting his son Hiram, near Mt. Airy, about a month ago, fell and injured his thigh, from which he never recovered.

NICHOLS.—Passed peacefully away, on the morning of Eleventh month 18th, 1903, at the home of her husband, Nathan B. Nichols, of Belmont County, Ohio, Sarah E. Nichols, at the advanced age of 76, the last of eight children, her seven brothers having preceded her. The last surviving brother was the late Jesse Hoge, well known as a minister of Goose Creek Meeting, in Loudoun County, Va., a frequent attendant at the Baltimore Yearly Meeting, and whose voice and messages of love were often heard.

She left to share the memories of a loving and devoted mother a family of five grown children, all of whom evidence the upright training and character of their mother.

Sarah E. Hoge was born in Loudoun County, Va., Fifth month 10th, 1827.

She was united in marriage with Nathan B. Nichols in 1853, removing with her husband to Ohio, where she has since resided.

Only a few days before her death she and her husband celebrated their golden wedding, surrounded by numerous relatives and friends, being in her usual health at the time.

In our sorrow, which looks forward with hope to a happy reunion, we the surviving husband, children and relatives tender this memento to her pure and loving spirit, her devotion to family, home and friends.

NOTES.

An extra meeting of the Friends' Association [of Cincinnati] was held at the home of Sarah Lippincott, Eleventh month 15th. The meeting was addressed by Mary Smith, a minister of the Society of Friends, and a member of the Illinois Yearly Meeting. Friend Smith is an active temperance worker, and is president of the W. C. T. U. in her own town. She was in Cincinnati as a delegate to the W. C. T. U. Convention, and the members of the Association felt it a privilege to have her with them for an afternoon. The meeting was well attended, and no one who was present could help feeling something of the spiritual uplift and the inspiration of the hour.—[Bulletin of the Cincinnati Friends' Association.]

At a meeting held under the care of the Membership Committee of the Philadelphia Monthly Meeting on Fourth-day, Twelfth month 2d, at 8 p.m., at the meeting house, Seventeenth and Girard Avenue, Joseph S. Walton delivered a most interesting lecture, entitled, "Mysticism, the Background of Quakerism." Notwithstanding the night was stormy, a well-filled house greeted the speaker. Upon the conclusion of the lecture an hour was set aside, devoted to Isaac H. Hillborn as a memorial. The clerk presented the following minute:

"We are reminded that one year ago to-night our blessed friend, Isaac H. Hillborn, now enjoying the reward of his faithful ministry in our Heavenly Father's realm, did give unto us an accepted interpretation of the principles and testimonies of the Society of Friends, the printed copies of which stand as a monument to his faithful spiritual ministry amongst his people. We revere his memory, and would add our testimony of reverence and love."

After a prayer by our friend, Joel Borton, of Woodstown, N. J., brief addresses were delivered by William Birdsall, Alfred Love and Leedom Worrell. At the conclusion of this hour of remembrance an expression of sympathy was voiced for Anna H. Hillborn, the one who is indeed in need of Christian sympathy. Upon the conclusion of the meeting considerable time was given to a quiet social and a general welcome of visiting friends, among whom was our well-known friend, Owen Jones, of Salem, N. J.

It is hoped that a more complete report of the lecture, etc., may be given at an early date.

WILLIAM J. MACWATERS,
Clerk of Girard Avenue Section.
2139 North Twentieth St., Phila.

We have received Volume I, Number 1, of the Bulletin of the Friends' Association of Cincinnati, it being the issue for Eleventh month, 1903. This is a little four-page paper issued monthly under the direction of the Executive Committee of the Association. It contains an announcement of the next meeting, an account of the last meeting and an extra meeting, a note in regard to the newly-formed Columbus Friends' Association, and an account of the Lake Mohonk Indian Conference. The Cincinnati Association feels a motherly interest in the Association at Columbus, Ohio, Isaac Butterworth, late of Cincinnati, having been one of these most largely interested in starting the new association.

The organization of a general meeting for Friends who cannot remain joined with the confederacy of pastorate and stated service Yearly Meetings, is already an accomplished fact in the region of Rich Square Monthly Meeting, North Carolina. This independent meeting has already received requests for membership from members of other Quarterly or Monthly Meetings; and has granted to Abram Fisher a minute for service in his expected travels from Florida along the Gulf Coast States. Apparently too much has been made of the "Uniform Discipline" as the cause of separation. The causes existed far back of that; but its coming to the front was the occasion of a disclosure of the separation which had long subsisted in doctrines of worship and ministry.—[The Friend (Philadelphia).]

COMMUNICATIONS. MINISTRY AND SILENCE.

DEEPLY interesting to me has been the perusal of the communications lately appearing in the INTELLIGENCER on "Silent Meetings," "Preparation for Vocal Ministry," and kindred topics, and I have been impressed with the variety and yet similarity of sentiment pervading all, that is, a belief in the thought that divine inspiration is the moving and the qualifying power in all effective ministry. And the indulgence of these varied thoughts, and the freedom to express them, in love and condescension one to another, are the privileges of our Society in an eminent degree, with no fear haunting either the "lay" member or the preacher, that he will be called to account for "heresy." I have wondered, sometimes, if our members do really appreciate this liberal feature of our denominational profession as highly as they should. This phase of religious liberty was not always as it is now, even in our own borders. . . . But the day of intolerance and persecution is passing from us. . . .

In the issue of Tenth month 3d, the editors have set forth very clearly the views of the original Friend, that all our meetings are held on the basis of silence, and that no vocal service, be it of devotion or business, should be transacted without a period of silence preceding, and yet we have read of those who, while the Society was in its incipency, and yet unorganized, would commence, on entering the door, to preach, and continue while walking to their seats, and after, if not through by then. Where was their "preparatory silence?" And did they go to meeting an "empty vessel," "waiting to be filled" before they felt qualified to hand forth to others, of the good things given them by their heavenly Father? We know there are some minds to whom the silence appeals as the highest form of worship, to whom the words of the old hymn, "Oh, for a closer walk with God," would mean a greater introspection of thought and feeling, a more entire subjugation of self and a total obliteration of everything outward; but it is to be feared these, as compared with the great masses of the people, are but a chosen few. Although, in other churches, great stress is laid on "using the time, that none of it be lost," I have heard some of their ministers say that the few minutes of quiet, which sometimes occur prior to the beginning of their services is the most precious part of the meeting to them, and I considered that statement as a strong endorsement of this phase of our methods of worship. But the majority of people seem to feel the need of something else, something tangible, as it were, which they can grasp, and, grasping, be helped in their efforts to reach the high ideal they have raised in their minds, and yet not quite attained. To such, the oral message is invaluable; without it, they are at sea, restless, uneasy, unsettled. Many a one, I believe, has been tendered by a few well-directed words, or the verse of a hymn, to whom the silence would have been meaningless. As a recent contributor has said, "Men and women . . . have a right to expect to hear something that will lift them up—something that will inspire them to live better lives."

I think our friend, W. J. MacWalters, in the issue of Tenth month 17th, was very pertinent and logical in his illustrations of active, as opposed to silent, ministry. I mean those he drew from the New Testament. To be sure, we read that Jesus "withdrew from the multitude" on various occasions, in order, no doubt, to refresh his drooping spirits by silent communion with the Father, and to gather strength to minister to the needs of the people who flocked to hear his discourse, not to sit in silence with him. Thus, both silence and speech have their proper time and place. The Old Testament, too, abounds in instances of a direct command from Jehovah of his chosen instruments. "Cry aloud, spare not," "Lift up thy voice," "Cry against the city," "Go speak unto the people," and many others of similar import.

One sentence in the article alluded to especially impressed me: "It may be wise to follow in the footsteps of our fathers but it is safer and better to follow in those of our Master." We will all acknowledge the force of the remark in a communication from T. P. Marsh, that while "Truth can not, and does not, change, the appreciation of it is constantly changing, and as it is known to us, it makes its impress on our minds." Another truism he uttered is, that instead of asking for a greater measure of the Spirit, as is often done, we "should strive for a keener perception, and a greater ability to use what is already at our disposal." What changes would be wrought in every phase of life, if this thought were carried into execution; to put to a higher and better use those capabilities we already possess, instead of allowing them to become useless from neglect.

We have need of a revival in our midst, that our vocal ministry be not, ere long, a thing of the past, for our leaders are, one by one, being removed, and there is need of others to take their places. ELIZABETH H. COALE.

FREE THOUGHT.

EDITORS FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

I THINK we may need to take note that on the all-important, because all-comprehensive, subject of religion, there is no neutral ground between fidelity and infidelity. I was glad to observe that your article in this week's issue on diversity of intelligence (entitled, "George Fox's Creed"), concluded with an apology, if not a plea, for freedom in revealing our diversities to one another. I would suggest that if we believe in the necessity and privilege of saintly communion, not only up yonder, but here upon the Lord's footstool, we must make it a plea rather than an apology, and even insist on the duty of such mutual revelation seasonably practiced, with a view to mutual aid in the joint promotion of the ever-harmonious truth of God, to the alone glory of God. Do we not believe that the light of God in Christ is still a progressive light, leading the Church, and through the Church the world, onward and upward to an ever-advancing attainment? Has the present age a right to live to itself, any more than we as individuals to live to ourselves, so ignoring the duty of yielding its increment to the true legacy of the past? Can we so glory in that true faith which "overcometh the world," rather than in that other faith, which, in the now classic phrase of Thomas Loe, "is overcome by the world"? I would prefer to think of FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER as a promoter of intelligence, and not merely as a bearer of news, or an arena of idle discussion on matters great or small.

Please do not charge me with offensive innuendo. I consider that our tendency is the most important element in our position, and have felt that as a truly interested subscriber I could do no less than offer these comments on the position assumed in the aforesaid editorial, for your assured toleration, if not also for your kind sympathy and possible unity, I remain with sincere respect, your friend,

RICHARD RANDOLPH.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS FROM ISOLATED FRIENDS.

A NUMBER of letters from isolated Friends have been received during the last three months, which have been awaiting a day of leisure for making extracts from them. A Friend who lives eight miles from Atlanta, Neb., writes: "My neighbors hold in a public school house two miles and a half from my home what we call a union Sunday School, as there are not enough of one denomination to organize a meeting or Sunday School. We now have a Methodist preacher come every other First-day to preach, and are using the 'Westminster Quarterly,' but all are not satisfied, as it is so complicated and hard to understand. I presented the loving message from the yearly meeting to some of the leading members, and they said they would be pleased to have Friends' lesson leaves in the school; there are about eighteen families represented. I believe the booklet, 'Religious Views of the Society of Friends,' will also be accepted amongst them. I will be glad to circulate all literature the yearly meeting is pleased to send me." (Lesson leaves and booklets have been sent.)

M. M. H. writes from Paris, France: "Especially at the time of our yearly meeting my thoughts are lovingly with you, although others now occupy places once so familiar to me, when the dear ones now passed away ministered so lovingly, not only in inspired words of eloquence like those of a George Truman, but in the unspoken ministry expressed through silent influence; radiating from the pure in spirit, of whom we had many in our midst. With the deep desire that Friends' principles might be more widely spread, I regret that opportunity to do this is far more restricted with me than with those of the absent ones who speak of the 'wide opportunities open' to them in this respect."

S. E. W. writes from Centerville, Cal.: "We are living about twenty miles from San Jose, at which place we occasionally go, that we may come under the religious influence of Joel Bean and his dear wife, Hannah. To my knowledge there are no Friends in this neighborhood, and when the plain language is used the listener stands with a blank look upon his face waiting an interpretation. How my little granddaughter is to be brought up to love the language of Friends is as yet a mystery. We keep ourselves informed of the doings of Friends through the FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER, and think it fully up to its old standard. Five years of almost constant isolation from my loved Society has strengthened rather than lessened my love for its principles, and I shall endeavor to hold fast to the faith in the power of silence."

A. and H. C. W. write from Compton, Ark.: "Friends are not known here, as there have never been any pamphlets or booklets distributed. Our family are the only ones we know of that hold to the Friends. There are a great many that talk to us about the Friends, but they have no knowledge of the Society. We give them the Rules of Discipline to read; they seem to think it good, and tell us it could not be better." (Some booklets have been sent to these concerned Friends.)

From College Park, Ga., L. T. W. writes: "This is the first day of the week, and I think of the privilege some members enjoy in going to Friends' Meeting; I wonder how it would seem to do so. So many years I have had to go to another denomination or not go to any place of public worship. Early impressions, environment and early-instilled education have kept me a member of the Society, though perhaps not a very consistent one, and from all I have heard and seen of other forms of worship, that has the ascendancy. . . . Every one is entitled to his own belief, but I cannot think conversion comes through excitement."

M. E. sends a breezy message from North Dakota, written in Ninth month: "This time the yearly meeting's letter found me in a pretty little prairie town, where I have come to spend the summer. And here, where the population is largely of foreign elements, a message from Friends is a joy, because it brings to the mind's eye and to the memory the old-time life and happiness. I spent this past winter in the Southwest, on the desert near Phoenix, Ari., and having spent three years in Colorado Springs, I have had an opportunity to see the extremes of mountain, prairie and desert. I feel that if I am not blessed with perfect health, yet it is a privilege to experience the influence of these extremes and to know the happiness of God's out-of-doors. The mountains are the richest joy to me, and the natural beauties about Colorado Springs are something to be forever thankful for."

Many other letters have been received expressing appreciation of the yearly meeting's message, and doubtless a still larger number have found a response in the hearts of those who have not found time to write, putting it off until a more convenient season.

BURLINGTON QUARTERLY MEETING.

THE Burlington Quarterly Meeting was held Twelfth month 1st, with a large attendance. We were favored in having with us Samuel Ash, Sarah Linvill and Nathaniel Richardson. Samuel Ash made a plea against extravagance resulting from great riches, saying Friends have an important mission in upholding the virtue of plain living. Sarah Linvill spoke of the need of full faith in God and Christ and what help this is in times of trouble. Nathaniel Richardson compared the times of nineteen hundred years ago with to-day, and said the vital question with us is, is the mission of Jesus Christ our mission?

The queries pertaining to the limited number attending week-day and business meetings evoked some discussion. The report from the Friends' Boarding Home Committee brought forth considerable comment. The expressions of deep gratitude given by two boarding at that home made the committee feel they were well repaid for their part of the labor.

The following is the sixth annual report of Friends' Boarding Home of Burlington Quarterly Meeting:

"We feel that our Home is now fulfilling the purpose for which it was established. We have seven boarders, six of whom are members of our Society.

"Harmony prevails within its walls, and we feel that we are established on the right basis. Since last report we have lost by death another valued co-worker, Rebecca W. Engle. We miss her counsel and aid in our deliberations, and deeply deplore her loss. Our expenses for repairs and furnishings have not been so great as last year, amounting to something like $65 in lieu of $165, noted in last report. All interested persons who wish to visit the Home will be cordially welcomed.

"A kind Friend, Mary Ann Schooley, recently deceased, has left by will a legacy of $200 to our Home, with which we propose to start an endowment fund, and we trust there will be others among us who will emulate her noble example. We feel to express our thanks for this kind remembrance, and also would again voice our gratitude to the donor of the Jeanes Fund, who first made possible the establishment of these Homes.

"MARTHA E. GIBBS, Secretary."

The treasurer's report showed about the same amount in the treasury as this time last year, thus keeping things evened up, but the committee would like to be in a financial position to give a still lower board to needy Friends, and with this idea in view hope our endowment fund may be increased from time to time.

FRIENDS' NEIGHBORHOOD GUILD.

DEAR FRIENDS: Will you let me call your attention to the Friends' Neighborhood Guild at 151 Fairmount Ave., Philadelphia? We have a large First-day School, a Sewing School (which is so full that we need more room and more helpers, to take in all those who are anxious to come), a Saving Fund, where the children flock every Second-day evening to put in and take out money; a manual training room to teach boys. We try to gather in all the boys and girls that we can, and instruct and amuse them, and surround them for a little time with wholesome influences, and this winter we feel that we should gather in more of the children.

To do this we must make our home more attractive—make it such a pleasant place that they cannot stay away. We have persuaded nine young men to use this place to meet in instead of one where they would be tempted to drink and play cards. We have promised them to fix up the south end of the room into a homey corner, where they can come and read and talk and rest. To do this we want a bright rug or carpet, four or five yards square; a couch, with loose cover; a pillow (this is for the babies who come with their mothers to our mothers' meetings); a library table; a desk, where the boys can write, and a few easy chairs; good pictures, some plants for our two sunny windows, and some good, modern, up-to-date books, and, of course, some good old ones. You all know what would be suitable. We also want good magazines and papers; we can make use of old ones, and would like to have some that they can take home to keep.

Then we want partly-worn or new clothing, so that when we find some poor old women half clad, or, like last night, a woman with a drunken husband, asking for shoes so as not to have to keep her child from school, there would be something to give her. We would be very glad of toys that well-to-do children have grown tired of for our Christmas time. Will not the Young Friends' Associations help us? Each one could send a few books.

I am sure that some of you have old-fashioned or partly-worn furniture to spare, and it will be most gratefully received. Come and see us, and see what we are trying to do, and I am sure that you will feel it a privilege to help in so good a work. We also need workers. Is there not some young woman who could teach a class in millinery and dressmaking on Fifth-day evenings? Some one with a gift for interesting boys who would come in and give little informal talks, twenty or thirty minutes, of places that they have visited. Our boys and girls are fond of music, fond of hearing recitations; if each one who reads this would give one evening, think how much it would mean to us!

We expect to start the mothers' meetings on Sixth-day, Twelfth month 11th, at 3 p.m., and shall be glad to have help with them. If any wishing to help will communicate with me in person or by letter I shall be very glad. You will find me at the Guild every morning, except Seventh-day, until 1.30, and on Second- and Sixth-days, all day long. Trusting that this will reach those who can help us, I remain,

Very sincerely yours, EMILY WILBUR,
Superintendent Friends' Neighborhood Guild.

LUCRETIA MOTT HOME FOR COLORED CHILDREN.

Located at 1712 Reed Street, Philadelphia.

THE Lucretia Mott Industrial and Religious Home for Destitute and Orphan Colored Children has stood for the past three years (founded in 1900), not merely as a shelter, but, in every true sense of the word, a home for little children, the offspring of negro parents—offspring, too often, of shame and filth—invariably the children of working girls who are more deserving of pity than blame. The sole purpose of the management is to provide a home for these discarded waifs; to save them from lives of indolence and crime; to give them comfortable sanitary living conditions; proper moral and industrial training, and to make possible useful and honorable careers.

Our principal support has come from the colored people. This is the first appeal we have been compelled to make to our white friends. The stringency of business, and the pressing demands always upon us, make this imperative.

Second-day, Twelfth month 21st, has been set apart as a Donation Day, and we earnestly appeal to those, who have been more abundantly blessed to help our needy ones. Money for rent, fuel and our contingent fund is sorely needed. Contributions of clothing, groceries, fuel, shoes, or books, will be gladly received.

Jeannette Johns, Susan Smith, M. H. Hinson, Committee on Donations.

FRIENDS' HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

THE want of a Friends' Historical Society has long been felt. Probably no section of the community, relatively to its numerical strength, is in possession of more material available for historical research than the Society of Friends, both in America and in the British Isles. Nor is antiquarian interest lacking among Friends, and an association appears to be needed which shall bring to a focus the disjointed efforts of scattered students, and supply a medium of communication between individual workers.

The recognition by the Meeting for Sufferings of London Yearly Meeting of the value of the Reference Library under its care by the appointment of a librarian, has given a stimulus to examination of Friends' records, and it is felt that the present time is favorable to the establishment of a Society which shall keep historical students in touch with one another.

It is decided:

(1.) That membership shall be open

(a) To any member of the Society of Friends on payment of a minimum annual subscription of $1.25 (5/-), or of a life composition of $25 (£5 5s. od.); and

(b) To any other person on similar payment, and on the introduction of two members;

(II.) That the officers shall consist of president, treasurer, secretary (or secretaries), and a small executive committee, of which the clerk of the Meeting for Sufferings, the clerk of that Meeting's Library and Printing Committee, the recording clerk, and the librarian, shall be ex-officio members, and to which several representative Friends in America shall be attached as consultative members;

(III.) That, as funds will allow, but no more frequently than four times a year, a journal shall be issued in the interests of the Society, and sent free to all members;

(IV.) That various documents of interest shall from time to time be printed as supplements to the journal, and be obtainable by subscribers at a reduced price; and

(V.) That, until a general meeting of members is held, the following shall act as officers of the Society:

President, Thomas Hodgkin, D.C.L., Litt.D.; treasurer, Robert H. Marsh; secretaries, Isaac Sharp, B.A., Norman Penney; executive committee, A. Neave Brayshaw, B.A., LL.B., John Dymond Crosfield, Joseph J. Green, J. Ernest Grubb, Anne Warner Marsh, John S. Rowntree, J.P., Charlotte Fell Smith; ex-officio, Henry Lloyd Wilson, Frank Dymond, Isaac Sharp, B.A., Norman Penney; consultative, George Vaux, Philadelphia; Allen C. Thomas, A.M., Haverford College, Pa.; Albert Cook Myers, M.L.S., Swarthmore College, Pa.; Rufus M. Jones, M.A., Litt.D., Haverford College, Pa.

It is hoped that, in order to carry out efficiently the objects of the Society, a large number of Friends, and others interested, will become members. Applications for membership and subscriptions may be sent to Rufus M. Jones, M.A., Litt.D., at Haverford, Pa., or 718 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Devonshire House,

12 Bishopsgate Without, London, E. C.

The first number of the Journal of the Society will be issued shortly, and will contain an article on the handwriting of George Fox; a sketch of the life of Ellis Hookes, first clerk to Friends in England; notes and queries; and other papers of general historical interest. It will be issued free to all members, and can also be purchased at the office of The American Friend, 718 Arch Street, Philadelphia, for 50 cents.

EDUCATIONAL. FOOTBALL.

THE time, perhaps, has come for those who are devoted to the things that Friends' schools and colleges stand for to take up seriously the question as to whether we will continue allegiance to football as the game of the autumn months. A good many long since took up the question and decided it off-hand in the negative. There have been all along those who pronounced the game brutal and dangerous; but too often opposition to football has meant merely coldness toward athletics in general, or toward any kind of inter-collegiate meets on the field of sport. It has often seemed to be coupled with an ignorance or of indifference toward the conditions and needs of outdoor school and college life. At any rate it has had no appreciable effect in the direction of calling a halt, indeed has not seemed to have been exerted seriously toward doing away with the evil it so roundly condemned.

Perhaps now the time has come for those who know the game, who have felt the fascination of it, who have had their hopes that it might be developed into something different, and who stand squarely for inter-collegiate sports and games, to consider seriously whether, after all, we are going to stay in line in this respect with the great colleges and go on playing football.

As one watches Haverford and Swarthmore quibbling and scrambling this way and that over the field, he cannot help remembering Haverford's record in cricket and Swarthmore's record in lacrosse. Haverford and Swarthmore at football are the merest youngsters, and their scores have not the slightest interest to the great teams of the country. It is not so when they play cricket or lacrosse.

When you see one of the great football teams come out on to the field you realize that a football player is really a monstrosity. Eleven such men are not to be picked from any three or four hundred students just as they come. The country has to be scoured for such men. A game is not a good college game when you cannot get a first-class team from an ordinary body of students, but have to scour the country for them.

A team of first-class football players is a relic of a primitive and rude stage in our social development. Present-day civilization does not produce them nor need them in its ordinary pursuits any more than in our climate and with our mode of life we need to encourage in ourselves the food capacity of our rude ancestors. Football is not a good game as far as developing a type of man for present-day life is concerned.

With all the disadvantages of the game that even its devotees regret, those who may speak with authority in such matters are now pointing out that football is not a good game from the point of view purely of sport. If that be true then surely the time has come for those who believe in athletics and in intercollegiate sport to consider whether football, whatever may be said of it for the great universities, and for the army and the navy, is a good game for schools and colleges with the ideals and the limitations of Friends' schools and colleges.

Some boys, they say, would not go to Swarthmore if the college did not go in for football. That may well be, but we ought also to keep in mind the, perhaps, larger numbers who are kept from going, partly, at least, because they cannot see how football and all that goes with it, fits in with the Friendly ideal of a guarded education. We ought to remember, too, those who do not feel satisfied about the matter, but yet do not speak out, nor keep their boys home from college, nor forbid them from playing, because they do not want to be disagreeable; but who would be very happy if football were no longer played in our schools.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE NOTES.

ON Third-day, Eleventh month 24th, the Friends' Central Club held a very successful meeting. On Thanksgiving Day President Swain attended the York County Institute and spoke there. Eleventh month 27th and 28th, he was present at the meeting of the Association of Colleges and Preparatory Schools of the Middle States and Maryland, which met in New York city at Columbia University.

The stockholders of Swarthmore College held their annual meeting in Philadelphia last Third-day, Twelfth month

1st. The members of the Board of Managers whose terms of office expired were re-elected. New by-laws were adopted and the old constitution abandoned. The reports of the Board of Managers and the president of the college were read and referred to proper committees for publication.

Fifth-day evening, Twelfth month 3d, the Declamation Contest for the Andrew C. Pearson prizes occurred. The judges awarded the first prize to Lydia W. Foulke, second to M. T. Hansell. There was a solo by Wilmer Crowel, and an instrumental selection by the mixed quartet.

Seventh-day, Twelfth month 5th, President Swain was one of the speakers at the High School Association of New Jersey, which held its meeting at Newark. He spoke on the "Indiana High School System."

Seventh-day evening, the 5th, the class of 1905 gave a recitation to the class of 1907.

On First-day, in Bible Class, self-government and the freedom of the will were discussed. "Man is free to do good only and not free to do wrong," was the general sentiment.

Dr. Wilbur M. Stine read a paper before the meeting, containing some high ideals relating to matter and spirit.

Dr. Appleton's World Literature Class has finished the reading of the Iliad. Various poetical translations of the poem, from Chapman's down to the present day, have been assigned to different members of the class for comparison with the literal version, and interesting reports have been recently given. The class has now begun the Odyssey, using the beautiful prose version of Butcher and Lang.

Prof. Hayes, in the current issue of "The Phoenix," begins a series of articles on "Some Old Authors," the first article discussing the poetry of Robert Herrick. The series opens with this introduction: "A pleasant and wholesome thing it is, in this noisy age, to turn back to those Old Authors whose friendship is enduring, whose charm is perennial. In a series of little papers for 'The Phoenix,' I hope to speak of some of those old-world poets and essayists whose pages I have long since learned to love in the genial sunshine of Class-room B. [Prof. Appleton's Class Room.]

GEORGE SCHOOL.—Because of the recent celebration on Eleventh month 6th and 7th, Thanksgiving Day was quietly spent. A half-holiday was granted and the customary fire-drill and a basket ball game took place in the afternoon.

The Concordia Literary Society held a meeting Seventh-day evening, Eleventh month 28th. The evening was devoted to Longfellow, and the following program was given:

Sketch of Longfellow, Harry Farquhar; recitation, "The Old Clock on the Stairs," Bertha Pancoast; reading, "The Story of Elizabeth," Rachel Heacock; recitation, "The Legend Beautiful," Mertie Crossdale; recitation, "King Robert of Sicily," George Eves; play, "Hiawatha."

Seventh-day evening, Twelfth month 5th, the Penn Literary Society held a meeting. The following program was given:

Recitations, "The Runaway Boy" and "God Bless Us Every One," Lola Caruthers; vocal solo, "Whip-poor-will," Cornelia Thompson; reading, "Liquid Air," Howard Fretz; paper, "Gleanings of the Pen," Mabel Nichols; piano solo, "Melody in F," Helen Stapler; monologue, "An Italian's View of the Labor Question," Arthur Henrie; play, "The Train to Manro."

George School has been admitted to the Pennsylvania Inter-scholastic Debating League, which comprises Brown Preparatory School, DeLancey School, Friends' Central School, Germantown Academy, Haverford Grammar School, Swarthmore Preparatory School, William Penn Charter School and George School.

Dr. Joseph S. Walton delivered an address on "Mysticism, the Background of Quakerism," at Girard Avenue Meeting House, Philadelphia, Fourth-day evening, Twelfth month 2d.

The lecture course for this year has been arranged and promises to be unusually interesting. The course is as follows:

Twelfth month 12th.—Reading, "Borrowed Spectacles," Leland Powers.

First month 9th.—"Peculiar Laws and Customs of Colonial History," Dr. Herman V. Ames.

First month 30th.—New Century Trio, entertainment.

Second month 19th.—"The Harp of the Senses, or the Secret of Character Building," Professor John B. De Motte

Third month 7th.—Reading, "The Cardinal King," Professor Henry L. Southwick.

FRIENDS' ASSOCIATIONS.

NEWTOWN, PA.—The Newtown Friends' Association held its regular monthly meeting on Fourth-day evening, Twelfth month 2d, at the home of Susanna Blaker. The president, Evan T. Worthington, opened the meeting by reading the fifth chapter of II. Corinthians, after which the secretary read the minutes of the last association.

Emma L. Worstall reported on behalf of the delegates to the conference of Young Friends' Associations at Wilmington. A committee was appointed to nominate officers for the coming year, and report at the next meeting.

Prof. George H. Nutt, of George School, gave an excellent résumé of the doctrine of immortality as held by the great religions beliefs of the world, with a few general remarks upon the question of immortality presented in a most interesting manner.

"How does Quakerism differ from other religions?" was very well answered in a paper by Louisa Woodman, after which a tribute to the memory of Isaac H. Hillborn was read by Ruth Anna Harvey.

Sarah W. Hicks submitted the following program for the next meeting, which will be held at the home of Daniel and Mary Beans:

"Prison Reform," Clay L. Hutchinson; "The Responsibility of the Meeting Towards its Members," Abbie B. Rice; reading, Anna Harvey; Discipline, Willis G. Worstall; current events, Robert Kenderdine; "Can Any Plan Be Suggested to Reunite Under One Head the Various Bodies of Friends in the World?" Franklin Packer.—[Doylestown Intelligencer.]

RISING SUN, MD.—A regular meeting of West Nottingham Young Friends' Association was held in the town hall on the afternoon of Twelfth month 6th. The president opened the meeting with a reading having for its subject "What Religion Stands for To-day," which embraced these thoughts: Religion is the most conspicuous fact in the annals of our race, and is the answer to the deepest longing of the human soul. It is the response which a rational being receives when he interrogates the unseen. The minutes of last meeting having been read and approved, the calling of roll was next in order. After which the day's program was considered.

Edwin Buffington gave a short talk on "The Old Testament and Its Relation to the Life of To-day." He said that we of the twentieth century must not feel that we have developed so far as to have no need for the old things. For they are the stepping stones, as it were, to present realities.

The Old and New Testaments were compared as boyhood and manhood. His talk throughout was principally historical. Moses, he said, was the first to conceive an idea of a nation. He was the first one to bring forth the bud which has blossomed into the flower, that of Christianity today. After the Mosaic Era came David, who, embodying the thoughts of Moses, advanced still another step and established a nation, with its capital at Jerusalem. He also organized an army and established a church.

The fundamental thoughts underlying the Old Testament can never be superseded because they are facts. And, no matter how far the people of to-day may advance in Christian experience, they can turn back to the Old Testament and find that God is a just God, and that He, through the Messiah, must ever be and continue to be the Saviour of the world.

"Our Individual Responsibility Toward the Meeting" was the subject of a paper prepared by Hannah P. Buffington. The thought was expressed that possibly if the race had arrived at the highest spiritual understanding, realizing the immanence of God, and could carry this thought into every action of our lives, we might not need the meeting; but our present undeveloped spiritual life calls for outward helps and incentives, and we naturally find much strength and encouragement in assembling together and mingling soul with soul in aspirations for a higher life.

There is a divine personal power within every man, and he is responsible for wielding that power as a factor in the evolution of the race. He is not only working out his own salvation, but in a measure helping or hindering a brother man as he wields that power for good or ill. Nothing is ever achieved except through individual faithfulness in small beginnings. We are so interlinked and interwoven in the co-operative plan of life that each duty left undone is like a flaw in a link of the great cable, which must eventually weaken the structure.

"Worship and Prayer" was the subject of a paper assigned, and in the absence of the one appointed, one of Whittier's poems entitled "Worship," was read.

A report of the general conference which recently convened in Wilmington was given by Janette Reynolds.

Some very interesting and helpful remarks were offered by various members in attendance. After appointing the Executive Committee for the ensuing year, a short silence was observed, and the Association closed.

JANETTE REYNOLDS, Cor. Sec.

LINCOLN, VA.—The Young Friends' Association held its first meeting of the season in the Friends' Meeting House on First-day, Eleventh month 29th, at 1.30 p.m., under the auspices of a committee of the monthly meeting. An encouraging number of both young and elderly persons was in attendance.

E. Bently Gregg, holding over from last year, presided, and Bertha J. Smith served as secretary.

After a brief silence the 12th chapter of Romans was impressively read by Ellen H. Smith.

A committee reported a constitution and by-laws, simple and comprehensive, for the reorganization and government of the association. These were adopted and a committee appointed to make nominations for the various officers. The articles provide that all business shall be conducted by parliamentary rules and all questions decided by vote, also that the constitution shall be signed, thus creating a definite membership.

The question, How can the association best promote an interest in our society and disseminate its principles? was discussed at considerable length by E. Bently Gregg, William T. Smith, Ida J. Nichols, Martha J. Brown and others. The consensus seemed to be that these ends can be best accomplished by all members, and others who are interested, attending regularly and taking an active and sympathetic part in the work.

An interesting report of the late yearly meeting was given by Ellen H. Smith, mentioning particularly the able and very suggestive address by Henry W. Wilbur to the Young Friends' Association on Seventh-day evening, and the addresses of Joseph Swain and Edward C. Wilson at the educational meeting on Second-day evening, also the presentation of the work of the Anti-Saloon League on Fourth-day evening.

Jessie H. Brown remarked that all such meetings were comparatively new features of the work of the yearly meeting, indicating a broadening of its scope and a progress towards more liberal things. He also mentioned with regret the almost entire absence of children from attendance at the regular business session of the yearly meeting, and suggested that the time must soon come when both the matter and the method of the business of the yearly meeting and of all other meetings in the society shall be so modified that younger people can really take an intelligent interest in them, and they become, in a measure, at least, attractive even to children. Under "Current Events" George Hoge gave several items of interest, among which was information concerning some recent discoveries of manuscripts that give a slightly different reading to some of the "sayings of Jesus."

"The History and Significance of Thanksgiving" was presented by Henry B. Taylor in an instructive and exhaustive paper. His review of ancient customs in England and other countries, out of which the thanksgiving idea has grown, was very interesting. The custom, as we now have it, is of comparatively recent origin. In fact, our own country is the only one in which Thanksgiving is generally and simultaneously observed at a fixed time designated by action of the authorities.

The proceedings ended with a recitation, "The Vow of Washington," by Whittier, given by Sara Brown in a highly-acceptable manner.

With a brief silence, the meeting adjourned.

LITERARY NOTES.

The Review of Reviews, in addition to its editorial comment on the Panama situation and Cuban Reciprocity, contains character sketches of "the two men of the month," Speaker Cannon and M. Bunan-Varilla. Of the new Speaker of the House, familiarly called "Uncle Joe," the writer says:

"If ever there was a man in our public life who knew how to say 'no' and stick everlastingly to it, 'Uncle Joe' is he. The eyes are merry and kindly, but they are sharp, too, and can 'see through' men and things with a searching power that is almost X-ray like."

W. T. Stead contributes an able review of Morley's "Gladstone"; and parents who are seeking the welfare of their boys will find Librarian Elmendorf's paper on "A Boy's Reading" full of helpful suggestions.

There is ever a welcome for the right sort of "nature-books," not those loaded down with arid science, but alive with fine sympathy and quiet interpretation of the out-door world. Such a book is Eden Phillpotts' "My Devon Year" (New York: Macmillan). The author is already favorably known for a series of romances portraying intimately the folk and the landscape of Old Devonshire; his last, "The River," is a strong story, alive with wistful beauty—a book of the school of Thomas Hardy. The present volume of reveries deals, as Jeffries might have dealt, with the wild life and flowers, the simple folk and the ancient memorials of the loveliest of the counties of southwestern England. The author pleads for a right love of God's beautiful world. What if it be Hellenic and "pagan"? Those who despise such nature-worship have "never lived alone with the earth. They never felt Nature touch their hearts to patience, lift their unrest, purify the foul places of their minds, call them clear-voiced to braver life and more courageous thinking."

Devonshire gave us the old poet, William Browne; it gave us the immortal Coleridge; above all, it gave us the lyrics of Robert Herrick. A fragrant chapter of Phillpotts' book was written in the quaint graveyard "where Herrick lies." One envies the author his happiness in reading the "Hesperides" amid the very scenes of their composition: "I had sooner read him here and now, amid the life and scent of the things he loved. . . . The hock-cart has vanished, the song of the wakers is still, and the maypole rises no more upon the village green; but youth and love, red dawn and golden twilight, dew and rain, and the buds of spring are immortal . . . welcome now to us as then to him, whose dust lies near my footsteps in this musical resting-place of the dead."

There is for each of the thirty-eight reveries a fitting illustration in soft sepia or silver blue; and the book itself comes out of Devonshire, being printed in the town of Plymouth.

A strong, carefully-wrought story of Wat Tyler's rebellion is "Long Will: A Romance," by Florence Converse (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.)—Long Will being Wm. Langland, the first poet of the poor and the down-trodden, who saw a vision on Malvern Hill and sang our earliest English song of sympathy for the unfortunate ones of the world. Chaucer himself figures in the story, a genial figure, "friendly, wise, merry and shy."

The author is a Wellesley graduate, who has of late years resided in a college settlement in Boston. The fine literary grace and the prevailing tone of altruism show the writer's debt to her training. It would be well if our colleges would equip more of such authors, whose books tend to uplift humanity.

Here is Long Will's prayer for power to write his great poem: "Lord Jesus, Prince of poor men, let me be thy jongleur, for all poor men's sake. With their misfortune am I right well acquainted. I have dwelled in their coats. I have eat of their hard bread of peace. How shall the king know this, that sleepeth within silken curtains? But kings give ear to a poet. . . . I will sing this in my song; how to live well, so that poor men be not so cast down, as now they are. Sweet Jesus, I will not cease to sing this one song. I will tell my tale, and the king shall find a way to succour his poor men."

"Castalian Days" (Frowde: London and New York) is a new volume from the chief of American sonnetters, Lloyd Mifflin. Here the author's powers of stately utterance and melodious dignity are shown to be on the increase; and the pensive Greek note of his earlier sonnets from the Sicilian idyllists is here and there repeated. His best work is akin to that of Wordsworth and William Watson in their sonnets. A representative sonnet is this fine memory of a "Sunset in Hellas":

"How many an eve, on yonder peak at sky,
I watched the shadowy pagant of the rest—
The fading hosts in plume and panoply
Pass, on the cloudy ramparts of the west!
Huge Titans, hurling towers from the crest
Of serried bastions that embattled lie;
And phantom galleons, slowly drifting by 'Mid amber seas, to heavens of the blest!
Islands of desolate gold; cities august
Empinnacled on the verge of scarlet deeps—
Dim, rose-flushed heights, crowned with aularian fanes,
Slow crumbling into wastes of ruby dust;
And plunging slowly down the crimson steeps,
The Horses of the Sun, with flaring manes!"

Preserve the Hornets' Nests.

From the Monthly Bulletin of the Pennsylvania State Division of Zoology.¹

As the hunting season is close at hand and the leaves will soon be off the trees exposing the hornets' nests to the view of keen-eyed hunters who roam through fields, orchards and woods, it is quite appropriate just now to call attention to the importance of protecting the nests of hornets and their inmates, rather than shooting through them and tearing them down, as is the custom in too many localities.

The hornet is one of the most beneficial insects, as it feeds on flies and insect larvæ, especially house-flies. They have no injurious habits, and the benefits they confer on mankind by destroying house-flies are indeed great. We know of several residences where hornets' nests are built against or near the buildings, and it is certain that at those places the house fly pest is kept well in check by nature's method. A large conical paper nest of these insects is just outside our study window, and we have the opportunity to watch these wolves of the air pouncing upon all small dark spots that resemble resting flies.

¹These Bulletins are published by the Pennsylvania Department of Agriculture and are issued each month under the direction of Prof. H. A. Surface, Economic Zoologist. They contain valuable information on animal and insect life in relation to growing crops and gardens and may be had free of charge on application to the State Zoologist, Department of Agriculture, Harrisburg, Pa. Among the subjects treated in the Bulletin for Tenth month are "The Potato Rot," "New Methods in Fruit Production," "Practical Measures for October."

It is well proven that the house-fly is instrumental in conveying the germs that cause typhoid fever, and they doubtless carry other obnoxious bacteria as well. Thus, their destruction is a sanitary measure, and the hornets contribute to the sanitary welfare of man. Where the hornets are killed the house-flies are permitted to multiply unmolested, as there are very few other important and effective natural enemies of these little dipterous pests. Where hornets are protected and abundant the flies are few in numbers. Does this not show conclusive argument for their protection? Some one will say that the hornets are terrific stingers, and we agree that indeed they are among the worst or most effective of creatures when acting in self-defence, but they never or very rarely attack any one excepting in defense of their homes. For this they should be given credit. Among the higher organisms, mankind would be called the meanest coward if he were not willing to fight most bravely in a similar cause.

A little later in the season when the queens or females have left the nests and have taken up their winter abode in hollow trees, under logs, loose bark, rubbish, etc., the workers will become dormant and later die. Then the nests may be brought into the house with safety and studied. They will be found of great interest, as they are made of paper—the wasps and hornets having been the first paper-makers. If the inmates should be alive their humming may be heard before they come forth with defensive intent, and their nest should be taken at once out into the cold air and left until all is quiet. Their paper is dried wood pulp, made from old logs, boards, shingles, and any other exposed and weathered fibres of wood. The amount carried at one time by one insect is readily discernible by the differences in color given by different kinds and conditions of wood. A close study of the exterior and interior structures of a hornet's nest will reveal much that is remarkable.

CURRENT EVENTS.

At a gathering last week in Washington at the home of John W. Foster, formerly Secretary of State, arrangements were made for a meeting of the National Arbitration Committee on First month 12th, 1904. Among those present were Admiral Dewey, General Nelson A. Miles, Wayne MacVeagh and Thomas Nelson Page. It is hoped that there will be an awakening of popular sentiment throughout the country demanding an arbitration treaty between the United States and Great Britain similar to the Hay-Panncote treaty of 1897, which failed by a close vote to receive the two-thirds majority required for its ratification. The new British Ambassador, Sir Henry Mortimer Durand, is an earnest advocate of international arbitration.

PAPERS have been served upon Professor Borden P. Bowne, of Boston University, the author of important works on philosophy and ethics, calling him to trial before the Ecclesiastical Court of the Methodist Episcopal Church to answer to the general charge of heresy. The first specification against Professor Bowne is that the philosopher's views concerning the Deity are contrary to the plain teachings of the Scriptures; the second, that his views of the inspiration and authority of the Holy Scriptures are also contrary to those Scriptures; the third, that his notion of the atonement is contrary, not only to the Scriptures, but also to the ritual of the Lord's Supper in the discipline of the Church. The fourth charge refers to his teachings of eschatology, which, it is declared, are directly contrary to the Scriptures and the Methodist standards of faith. The last statement is that Professor Bowne disseminates views of Christian experience "contrary to the plain teaching of the Holy Scriptures and contrary to the established doctrines of the Methodist Episcopal Church." The Methodists have heretofore succeeded in avoiding any collision between their creed and scientific investigation, and they will have the heartfelt sympathy of their fellow-Christians in this entanglement.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT's message to Congress recounts the achievements of the past year, giving the first place to the creation of the Department of Commerce and Labor, the purpose of which is "to bring about a better industrial condition," under which there shall be "obedience to law and recognition of public obligation" on the part of all corporations. The message calls for economy in government expenditures, the exclusion of undesirable immigrants, the revision of public land laws, tariff relief for the Philippines, and the improvement of the army and navy. The advantages of arbitration are spoken of in connection with the satisfactory adjustment of the Alaskan boundary and the Venezuelan claims. One-fourth of the message is devoted to the Panama situation. The President claims that the new republic has succeeded to all the rights of the former owners, and has simply recognized the rights vested in this government by the treaty with New Grenada (now Colombia) in 1846, which secured free transit across the isthmus; and concerning the action of our government he says the United States "would have been guilty of folly and weakness, amounting in their sum to a crime against the nation, had it acted otherwise."

THE United States Department of Agriculture made public at noon on the 2d instant its estimate of the year's cotton crop—9,962,000 bales. This low estimate caused the wildest speculation in Wall Street, and in a short time the price of cotton advanced $3.75 a bale. The smallness of the crop is owing to the ravages of the boll weevil. This pest is spreading, and Secretary of Agriculture Wilson recommends in his report that $50,000 be appropriated by Congress to find a way of checking the evil. A convention in Louisiana to consider this subject asked for a special session of the Legislature (which will be called), to make laws restricting the shipment of cotton-seed into the State, and urged the enforcement of laws for the preservation of birds. Because of the high price of cotton, manufacturers of New England and the South are planning concerted action to restrict their output, reduce wages and break the present speculation by not buying cotton. Fifteen thousand cotton mill operatives in Connecticut and Massachusetts have been notified of a 10 per cent. reduction in wages, and the Chase Mill, at Fall River, is to run on half time.

In by-gone days there were eminent citizens of Virginia, including John Randolph, of Roanoke, who boasted that the blood of Pocahontas ran in their veins. Now the Virginia State Board of Education has decided that it would "impair the usefulness" of a public school to allow a pupil to attend who is one-sixty-fourth Indian.

A STORY is going the rounds in the newspapers about Mark Twain and Bishop Doane, who was once rector of St. John's Church, Hartford. Mark Twain would occasionally attend. Twain one Sunday played a joke upon the rector.

"Dr. Doane," he said, at the end of the service, "I enjoyed your sermon this morning. I welcomed it like an old friend. I have, you know, a book at home containing every word of it."

"You have not," said Dr. Doane. "I have so," said the humorist. "Well, send that book to me. I'd like to see it."

"I'll send it," Twain replied. And he sent, the next morning, an unabridged dictionary to the rector.

Now that the notorious Parks is out of the way and his Union no longer powerful in New York, the labor situation there is such that there is a widespread belief in building and building trade circles that there will be a notable revival of building in the spring.

"I DO NOT see Why God should e'er permit some things to be When he is love; But I can see, Though often dimly thro' the mystery, His hand above!"

Now—'tis that elusive moment The wise appropriate; 'Tis gone forever if we dare So much as hesitate.

SUZANNA MECHNER, a German girl who has been in this country but a few months, left her home in Chicago one Sunday evening not long ago to visit her uncle. She lost her way, according to the Chicago Record-Herald, and was found wandering around the streets early Monday morning. When the police took her to the Hyde Park station she could tell them nothing that would aid in finding her relative or her home, but when asked how they were to help her out of her difficulty she asked, naively, "Kannen sie nicht advertise?" And yet those there be who sit up nights worrying about our ability to assimilate emigrants. — [Printer's Ink.]

It was on a train going to Concord. A man turned to the one behind him and said:

"Do you belong in these parts?"
 "I was born and brought up in Boston."
 "Well, who was this Emerson all of the papers are so full of?"
 "He was George B. Emerson, whose 'Arithmetic' was in all of the public schools, and in which was an example in 'vulgar fractions' so long and difficult that it filled the minds of all the pupils with a perfect hatred of anything vulgar, and so naturally they all loved 'the Beautiful.' — [Boston Transcript.]

GOOD WORDS FOR 1903.

LI.

Sit down and count the cost of ploughing up thy field, and of searching after the hidden treasure of pure and true wisdom, and consider seriously whether thou canst sell all for it, both inward and outward riches; that if thou do set thy hand to the plough, thou mayst not look back after anything else, within or without, but mayst be content and satisfied with the pearl of true wisdom and life alone.

ISAAC PENINGTON.

BELIEF.

THE pain we have to suffer seems so broad,
Set side by side with this life's narrow span.
We need no greater evidence that God
Has some diviner destiny for man.

He would not dream it worth His while to send Such crushing sorrows as pursue us here,
Unless beyond this fleeting journey's end
Our chastened spirits found another sphere.

So small this world—so vast its agonies—
A future life is needed to adjust
These ill-proportioned, wide discrepancies
Between the spirit and its frame of dust.

So when my soul writhes with some aching grief,
And all my heart strings tremble with the strain,
My reason lends new courage to belief,
And all God's hidden purposes seem plain.
—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

THE DIVINE IN NATURE.—II.

THE next field of microscopic study which opened before me was that of the plumage of birds. I had studied all the systems of classification in use amongst ornithologists of that time, and was satisfied with neither. As a structure existing among birds alone, the feather seemed to me to offer some clue to systematic order in this class of animals, and I hoped that the differences it might show in the various groups, would be useful in pointing my way to a natural classification.

While working with a small microscope of low power, at the Academy of Natural Sciences, Prof. Baird, of the Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D.C., one day entered and saw how inefficient was the instrument for the task I had undertaken. The next morning he laid a roll of bills on the table before me, remarking, "I have a friend who has more money than he knows what to do with. He sends you this for a good microscope. Take it and repay it to science many times." That friend was George W. Childs, of Philadelphia. I record the incident because it is due alike to the scientist and the philanthropist. Doubtless it was only one of a thousand cases in which timely aid was offered to enthusiastic effort. Not only did Prof. Baird help me to see what would otherwise have remained hidden, but he directed his assistants to send to me any specimen of feather of which I might be in need. My opportunities for study were therefore exceptionally good, and I profited by them by making myself acquainted with the leading differences of structure in the feathers of the various groups in the whole class of birds. Mary Peart, whose drawings of butterflies are unexcelled by those of any living artist, lent me her aid by making a number of beautiful drawings direct from the microscope, few of which have ever been published, owing to the fact that after many months of study, the volume of Nitsch, published by the Ray Society of London in 1867, was placed in my hands. This German author had devoted the leisure of thirty years to the same study, and his drawings were so perfect that they might have been taken from my own microscope.

Of course I was discouraged from venturing on the expense of an American publication, as at that date it would have been a serious, if not impossible, effort. I have since greatly regretted that circumstance, as the field was wide enough for both, and as the majority of my drawings were of instructive details not included in the work of Nitsch. I did, however, utilize these by enlarging them so that they could be seen at a distance, and giving lectures upon them to appreciative audiences, so that in this manner something was done for science—not as much as should have been accomplished, but all that was at that time in my power.

It would require a volume even to show the scientific uses of these drawings. Suffice it to say here that either by the down or by the mature feather, or by some peculiarity of its structure, almost every great group in the whole class of birds can be distinguished, in some cases even families being recognizable, although at the meeting points there may be a blending of characters.

My studies were by no means lost to me, personally. They had served to clarify my ideas of classification, and I was quite ready to accept the arrangement of those more recent ornithologists who placed the earliest of extinct birds at the base of the class, and their successors in time, in ascending order, until, finally, the singing birds were reached as the highest outcome of the class, in more recent geological periods.

Selecting twenty-four primary characters, I traced one or the other of them, in a spiral of ascent, around a central axis, from the lowest to the highest of birds, and became fully convinced that a truly natural classifiction could only be represented by a series of branches, taking their rise at successive periods of time after the development of the earliest known bird in the Jurassic, each branch proceeding towards the differentiation and perfection of its own types, but never again uniting with any other branch, any more than the lower limb of a tree unites with a higher one. A new branch may carry up characters belonging to a lower one, and may unite with these, something belonging to its adjacent branches, but it will also possess some dominant characteristic belonging to neither—something which shows a rise in organization—a step in advance towards the perfection intended. But as the branch should diverge as widely as possible, there must be expected great differences within its own limits, some superior, some inferior, and some of a perfectly balanced nature. As the branches rise around the central axis, they lose one by one the inferior characters, the superior ones becoming dominant until the highest ideal is attained.

Applying these principles to each class in the animal kingdom, and to plants as well, I studied them for their verification, so that beginning with ornithology, I was led gradually to the whole system of life, and to the cosmic influences which govern all the worlds. Once started in the pathways of nature, there is no stopping place, and can be none, since the infinite is leading the finite. Our mortal limitations are around us, bounding our powers, and these limitations, being God-given, should be cheerfully and even reverently admitted, and obeyed; but that the desire to know all we can of the universe of which we are a part, can ever be extinguished in the human mind, I do not for one moment consider possible.

Going back to the egg to see how much preparation must be made before a feather can be developed, we find by observation and experience that a gentle warmth must be applied either by the mother bird or by an artificial incubator, to start into activity the germ already provided. The production of a living bird by either mode is so common that we forget that it is a miracle. Yet it belongs to a class of phenomena the most mysterious in nature. All birth, whether of a sun and its planets, or of the inhabitants of our earth, is so marvelous that we may well be stilled into silence before any manifestation of its wonder. A little carbon, hydrogen, oxygen and nitrogen, and we have vitalized protoplasm, out of which are produced all living things. From the protoplasm a cell with an enclosing membrane and a nucleus—more cells, and here is the beginning of a chick. Let us break an egg each day and see how pulsation begins; how arteries ramify; how veins return; how a spinal column and brain are formed; how all the organs of the senses are defined; how bone and muscle take their places, and finally how a skin is fitted to cover the whole. In the skin a tiny capsule—within that a central bag—in the bag an artery to supply blood, and a vein to carry away the rejected material—a nerve to stimulate these into action, and to direct exactly how the downy tuft shall be formed. For there is a difference. If the egg be that of a duck or goose, the tuft shall be of one kind.

If it be of the barndoor fowl it shall be another, and so on through all the birds hatched with a downy covering, and soon able to follow the mother and pick up their own food. For those sea birds which are swimmers, reared in nests, the down will be of a different character, longer and more silky, and so through all the tribes with helpless young till we come to those in which there is no down preceding the true feather, or only a remnant of what was once of use. This is the case with the singing birds and with several other groups approaching them in a certain degree. The humming-bird is not a singer, but it is hatched as nude as any. In these cases the feather arteries and veins and nerves do not begin to act at once. They await their proper time. When they do begin their work they complete it rapidly, and by the time the bird is strong enough to use the muscles of the wing, the feathers are ready, but the true feather is quite different from the down, which, in the lower orders, precedes it. It is far more complicated in structure, and in form, color and size may differ with every species. The parts of the feather require to be named to facilitate description. Thus the main stem or quill is the shaft. Its border on each side is the vane. The latter is composed of threads known as barbs. These are fuzzed by smaller parts termed barbules, and these bear hooklets and barbels. Now barbs, barbules, barbels and hooklets differ with every tribe, and some birds are without one or the other. The variety in the class is so astonishing that it is difficult even to imagine it.

When the feather is forming, out of the protoplasm secreted by the blood a granule is extracted and deposited between the inner and outer bag of the double capsule. In this manner a ring of granules is formed, and they give rise to cells. The cells are the starting-point of a ring of barbs. Two of these unite to form the stem, which rises and carries with it the adjoining pair of barbs, and so on until the whole ring is lifted and the outer capsule bursts, when the feather continues to rise and by the constant addition of cells from below, is finally completed, the lowest and latest being the downy part at the base of the vane. The barbs consist of numerous cells flattened out into a plate, which is covered by a transparent horny material. This horny material is itself formed of spindle-shaped cells without a nucleus, the cells being visible under the microscope in their young stage, but soon lost in their transparency. It is the material out of which the quill is formed, and also the hooklets hereafter to be mentioned. At one edge the barbs send up at right angles to their floor, a wall of perhaps one-fifth their width, and from the edge of this wall, bending over the barb, arises a fringe of barbules. Exactly at the right spot to enable them to catch into the barbules of the next plate, the hooklets are placed so that they may strengthen the vane as far as possible, and yet leave it extremely light, pliable and elastic. It is, in fact, a double weaving of the vane. The hooklets being transparent, and under the microscope appearing silvery, are very beautiful objects in which bear them can always be distinguished addition to their marvelous workmanship. The bar-from the barbs, because they consist of a single line of cells, instead of many. The edge of each cell in the line, when expanded to a point but not hooked, is termed a barbicel. I do not know of any especial office which these structures perform. They appear to me to be simply unformed hooklets which are not needed.

In the geese and ducks, where a very close textured oily feather is required to shed water, the hooklets are much more numerous than they are in the feathers of the walking birds or amongst the singers. Amongst the latter, the hooklets may be reduced to four or five in number upon each barbule, just where it curves to clasp the threads in advance of it.

In the attainment of beauty imperfections are frequently used, but always with purpose. Thus in the soft and graceful plume of the ostrich it is the absence of hooklets which permits the loose flowing of the barbules, the barbs being left to float freely in the air. To the same cause is due the ornaments of the cranes, herons, paradise birds, and the grace in the tails of many species, including some small warblers of Australia known as emeu wrens.

In the lyre bird the ornamental pattern of the two large feathers, which give it the name, is outlined by the omission not only of hooklets, but also of the barbules themselves, thereby giving a transparent effect to the tracery of the plumes, the result being no less beautiful than remarkable.

In many species the barbs are omitted for a certain distance, and then resumed for purely ornamental purposes, the alternations of naked shafts and barbed ones being highly effective. This kind of ornamentation is especially to be seen amongst the four hundred species of humming birds, and is also to be noticed in the saw-bills and night jars, as well as some other birds.

In methods of adornment we can scarcely imagine one which has not been employed. Burnished metals give the impression of hardness, but along with the most brilliant metallic plumage, the softness of the feather is always retained. In the humming birds of America, and the sun birds of Africa, the colors in vertebrate life reach their highest expression. The extreme variability in different lights may be partially explained by the microscopic structure of the feather as seen in our common ruby-throated humming bird which visits our flowers, and nests with us, retiring southward to escape our winter's cold.

In this bird the most brilliant spot is its throat. Taking the feather of a dead bird from this part we find that the greater portion of it is dark in color and wholly lustreless. Only about seven barbs on each side of the stem, are of ruby glowing like fire. These are close set with barbules which overlap each other firmly, and are further strengthened by the binding in of the threads in which they end, thus forming a selvedge so that to the unassisted eye the brilliant part looks like a single scale. Hooklets would be useless here, consequently there are none. Each barbule is a flattened plate with an upper and a lower side, and an anterior and posterior margin—four surfaces in four different colors. The upper is a rich magenta or ruby, so brilliant that it is impossible to adequately reproduce it by art. This is complemented by green. The anterior margin is of gold, and the posterior dark plumbeous. In life, as the bird moves we see the ruby, the green and the gold, as the light happens to fall on either surface, and, under the microscope all four of the colors are revealed as the barbule is turned in different ways.

In the loose barbs of the pea fowl, gold, green and rosy bronze seem to play much the same part. In the whole magnificent array of this bird there is not a single harsh contrast of color. All the tints are accordant and blend softly into each other. They belong to that part of the spectrum from yellow green to rosy purple, and violet, passing through shades of blue in the "eye" where the color is most intense.

The most striking effects are produced by contrasts of color, as in the parrots, toucans, trogens and others. It is also true that the lighter colors of the underside of the body are apt to be contrasted with the deeper tints of the upper. This is not universal, as there are frequent exceptions, but it is sufficiently common to attract attention in viewing a collection from all parts of the world. It is, moreover, true that the finest singers of the world, or nearly all of them, are inconspicuous in their colors. In the development of their vocal organs, and in the refinement of the nervous organization which enables them to enjoy their own music with intensity, they appear to have left color of plumage behind them. But as a whole the class of birds exemplifies the laws of color, which, born of light, appear everywhere in our solar system. The clouds of evening, unpurpled and golden, brilliant with a thousand dyes in the glory of the setting sun, are scarce warmer in their tints than is the plumage of tropic birds. These find their hues repeated in flower, insect, gem, and pearly shell and drop of dew, and the stars burn on through the ages, flashing to their banded mates the same responses. The moon in her silver purity, the skies lighted up by auroral splendor, brown earth, lichen wood, mossy sod, and night black spaces, all have their counterparts of color in the feathered world. There are souls of lily purity for the delicate tints of earth and sky, and fully rounded natures; the true poets and painters of our race, for the colors of the universe in all their harmonious diversity. To each of these God gives his ordination and approval, and from all should ascend a daily hymn of thanks for the benisons bestowed.

THE world looks at ministers out of the pulpit to know what they mean when in it.—[Cecil.]

If thou desire the love of God and man, be humble; for the proud heart, as it loves none but itself, so it is beloved of none, but by itself; the voice of humility is God's musick, and the silence of humility is God's rhetoric. Humility enforces, where neither virtue nor strength can prevail, nor reason.—[Francis Quarles.]

THE MINISTRY OF FRIENDS IN ENGLAND. At the time of London Yearly Meeting last Fifth month the subject of the ministry took a remarkable hold upon Friends, and since then, especially in view of the conference on the subject ordered by the Yearly Meeting to be held in the autumn, there has been a great deal of very searching discussion in the Friend, the British Friend and the Friends' Quarterly Examiner. All this discussion does not bear directly on the situation in our branch of the Society in America in regard to the ministry. For instance, the question as to recording ministers has not as yet come to be a matter of as practical concern with us as it is felt to be among English Friends, though in some of our meetings it has been a matter of serious consideration. But the discussion, taking it all together, goes to the "roots of Quaker ministry," and is as interesting for us as if it had been carried on with particular reference to our own situation.

The subject was first brought up in the London Yearly Meeting on Ministry and Oversight, and was the outcome of a minute sent down the year before calling attention to the need for "spiritual efficiency" in meetings for worship. It was introduced by Edward Grubb, who said that the most serious question now before the Society is how to vitalize the ministry and to raise its quality. "We are," he said, "at a critical point, when the question is whether a 'priesthood of all believers' is to be a practical reality or not, whether a wholly non-professional ministry can be maintained in the face of the altered conditions of life. We shall not find the answer to this question by repeating ancient formulae, or following America, or letting things drift. The foundation of improvement must be a deeper spiritual experience, raising the spiritual level of us all."

In the discussion that followed the whole question was considered very frankly and from different points of view, the outcome being that the yearly meeting directed the convening of a conference on the ministry which might place recommendations before the yearly meeting next year. It was afterward arranged that this conference should be held at York in Eleventh month.

Following are extracts from articles and communications that have appeared in the various English Friends' papers during the summer and fall:

The Friend (London) for Sixth month 12th, said editorially: "Discussion in the Society of Friends is now happily lifted from small questions to that which is vital to the progress of every church, the direct ministry of the gospel. This theme is evidently to the fore for some time to come."

"The next week the Friend said in an editorial on the acknowledgment of ministers: "In view of the conference on the ministry, . . . we must recognize that there is much that is lacking in the ministry among us, but it does not follow that it is desirable to abandon the acknowledgment of ministers altogether.

"A free ministry is on its trial. If it ends in confusion and every man doing that which is right in his own eyes, it will have been weighed in the balance of experience and found wanting. But is it so? We believe not. We believe there is a great deal of gospel ministry at the present time among Friends, acknowledged and unacknowledged, in which we may all heartily rejoice. . . .

Probably there was never the exercise of a greater variety of gifts in the ministry than there happily is to-day. The learned and the unlearned, the carefully-thought-out discourse and the impromptu exhortation and thanksgiving, the simple exposition and reading of scripture, the freshly-expressed or the newly-comprehended truth, all have their appropriate place and opportunity in our meetings for worship. . . . This growing variety and diversity of expression in the ministry may have made it harder for monthly meetings to act with uniformity. But this lack of uniformity may be just the means in the hand of the Supreme to lead us out into a more solid unity."

In the Friend of Seventh month 17th there is a letter from Caroline E. Stephen, the author of "Quaker Strongholds," the same letter appearing also in the "British Friend" for Seventh month:

"Many Friends have, I know, long believed that the practice of 'recording ministers' should be abandoned. Slowly, and as the result of some years of experience in that position, I have come to the same conclusion. I believe that experience shows the custom to be (notwithstanding some practical conveniences, real or apparent), full of snares both to the recorded and the unrecorded. For the lists of the true and divinely-qualified ministers, and of those humanly regarded as such, will never quite coincide; while the distinction, important as it is, between the mere record of a fact and the conferring of an office, is by no means obvious to all, or always fully borne in mind."

The British Friend in its issue for Seventh month has an article by Charles Heath Clark who speaks of the great importance to the life of the Society of the practice of recording ministers, and continues: "The origin of the system seems difficult to trace; but there is reason to believe that it grew on to the life of the Society, rather than that it was at any given date consciously adopted. Perhaps it never would have been adopted had it been first examined in all its bearings as a fresh departure in church government. If it had been so considered, it is difficult to believe that the practice could have been felt to be in harmony with that complete spiritual equality which undoubtedly was aimed at by the founders of our body. . . . A sense of inconsistency between principle and practice in this matter has, apparently, always been present with some among us, who have shown it by refusing the acknowledgment of their own ministry. . . .

"It may be that the necessity for a change would have been felt earlier in our history had not the spiritual life of the Society been for a long period reduced to a low ebb, and the vocal ministry limited to a very few. Under such conditions a system may have been workable which, amid circumstances of greater life and activity, soon revealed signs of inherent weakness. . . .

"The first difficulty [with the system of recording] has been that of deciding whom to 'record' and whom to leave. If the original intention was that the recognition of the Church should correspond with the exercise of the gift of vocal ministry, then the system has utterly failed to carry it out. The occasional utterances, the hesitating offerings of loving, earnest souls, which represent to us one of the priceless treasures of a free ministry, have found little or no place in the recording system. Those whose service has led them a little away from the beaten track, who have not conformed exactly to the accepted standards, who have struggled to be true rather than to be 'sound,' have had to wait; and some of them died waiting. Often we feel that quantity rather than quality must have been the reason for taking 'action.'

"The difficulty of making any human record correspond with, and neither lag behind nor go before, the divine power and inspiration, is probably insurmountable. . . .

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL LESSON ON PEACE.

[The following peace lesson, which we take from the Interchange (Baltimore) for Eleventh month, might be used on Twelfth month 28th, which has been agreed upon and will be observed by many congregations as Peace Day.]

Read Matthew, xxvi., 47-54 and John, xvii., 28-38.

God's promise to Abraham was that in his seed should all nations of the earth be blessed. Genesis, xii., 3.

The promised Messiah was to be of the house of Judah, and to him should the ingathering of the nations be. Genesis xlix., 10; Jer., iii., 17.

His kingdom was to last forever. Dan., ii., 44.

He should execute judgment and justice. Jer., xxiii., 5; Isa., ii., 1-4; ix., 5, 6, and Isa. xi., 1-10.

He was to be a conquering prince. Zech., xiv., 1-3, and 9; Isa., xi., 13.

Summary: God was to visit his people and to him was to be a gathering of all nations, he would judge them with righteous judgment and there should be peace.

At the same time there was a strong belief that the Messiah would destroy the enemies of Judah. By the time Christ came this belief was uppermost in the minds of men. Indeed, the conditions of the Jewish people were such that a warlike Messiah seemed to be the only one who could deliver his people from the foreign yoke, and cause all nations to flock to Jerusalem, the only king, in short, who could fulfil ancient prophecy.

Jesus, the one whom we accept as the Messiah, came indeed of the tribe of Judah, but he came as the son of poor parents and spent the greater part of his life as a carpenter. When he reached years of discretion he joined himself with those who desired righteousness and was baptized of John in the Jordan. Then perhaps with greater vividness than ever before came upon him the realization of his mission as the Messiah of the Jews, the deliverer and Saviour of his people. At the same time came the temptation to gain these ends as did other great deliverers. In a moment he saw the kingdoms of the world, the glory, splendor, and power which they had won by the force of arms. Could he not by the same means achieve the same results, and with these results could he not accomplish greater things? for was not he the son of the God of all the earth?

But no, down through the ages rings the answer, "Get thee behind me, Satan, for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve."

After this come the three years of Christ's public ministry. This should be briefly reviewed in the classes, laying special emphasis on the way in which he entered into the lives and interests of the poor. Most of his followers were fishermen. Once when they had labored all night and caught nothing he bade them cast the net once again. They did so, and now there were so many fish that they could scarcely drag them to land. Luke, v., 4-11. He fed the hungry; he healed the sick; in short he supplied the needs of those around him. Matt., xi., 6. He taught his disciples that he who would be greatest in his kingdom must be the minister, the one who served others. Matt., xx., 25-28, and he himself washed their feet. John, xiii., 4-17. Of himself he said, "The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost."

The men of that day were unable to stand this teaching of loving service to God and to their fellow-men (see also the parable of the Good Samaritan, Luke, x., 20-37, and the account of the rich young man, Mark, x., 17-23) for more than three years. They did not want a serving Christ but a fighting Christ. Some have thought this was what induced Judas to betray his Master, that he did it in hopes of forcing him to declare his mission as the Messiah. Whether this view be correct or no, does not affect us here, the fact remains that Jesus had the chance of defending himself with the sword and refused to use the opportunity, but said, "My kingdom is not of this world, if my kingdom were of this world then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews; but now is my kingdom not from hence." John, xviii., 36. Christ's kingdom was God's kingdom and he used God's weapons of warfare. The members of God's kingdom do not fight. Christ, the great founder of this kingdom upon earth, spent his life in serving others; yes, and when he found that the life of service was not sufficient he poured out his life that he might serve them to the uttermost.

What has been the result of Christ's life of unreserved outpouring of himself for others?

That out of all nations men have come to him and have found blessing and rest.

That he has established a kingdom whose laws are righteousness and peace, and one which will last forever.

That those nations which most nearly follow him have been the leading nations in the world's history.

That the world conquering power is the power of loving service, for it is the power of God.

THE YOUNG FRIENDS' REVIEW.

WITH this issue the Young Friends' Review is united with the FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER. The two papers desiring to make their appeal to exactly the same people, it has been felt by those responsible for each paper that the work of each could be carried on most effectively by issuing them jointly.

The name of the joint paper is to be the FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER, but that the name of the Young Friends' Review does not appear in the title does not mean that it is merely absorbed and is no more to be heard from.

The Friends who started the Young Friends' Review in Canada felt that there was a need for the new paper that no other publication was filling. When the Review was moved to New York City it became possible to enlarge it and to widen its scope and its field of usefulness.

Now when a third move is made, it is with the thought that the work of the Young Friends' Review may be carried on still more effectively and that the younger paper is to have a distinct influence on the older. The editors of the INTELLIGENCER, in taking up the work of the Review, will endeavor to let none of the lines along which its promoters have been working be lost sight of, and will hope that all those who worked so devotedly for the Review in Canada, and all those who have been making sacrifices for it in New York, will feel their responsibility for it still, and help to make the joint paper truly a FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER and Young Friends' Review.

THE OBSERVANCE OF CHRISTMAS.

THE Friends of earlier days felt it necessary to bear a testimony against the observance of special days and times as more sacred than others, and the adherence to this principle developed among us the custom of not observing Christmas in any way. The attitude of the Society has greatly changed in this respect, indicating a healthful tendency toward progress; for the need which called forth the testimony has largely passed away, and this particular day has taken on a significance which extends its influence far more widely than it could ever have reached in its primitive observance as a sacred day in the churches.

Positive far-reaching influences in society have radiated from the impressions made upon the world by the familiar story of the manger-cradled babe, and the shepherds' anthem, "Peace on earth, good will to men." The so-called Christmas spirit that has developed in the world has something truly and deeply Christian in it. Whenever the anniversary season rolls around, all society feels more or less the general tendency toward good will to men. Men hold their purse strings less firmly, and there is a general thoughtfulness for others rather than ourselves.

At this time more than at any other during the year, the realization of the brotherhood of man comes closer to human hearts. Our Christmas gifts to the poor are bestowed now, less with a feeling of alms giving than of lightening the burdens of those who are heavy laden, and bringing gladness into lives shadowed by illness, poverty or misfortune. A day that tends to make us a little less absorbed in the pursuit of worldly gain, to bring into play the better instincts of mankind, to stimulate healthful pleasures and to turn men away, for even a day, from the thought of self and its interests, to bring us nearer to the realization that all men are brothers, serves a purpose so important to the final success of Christ's mission upon earth, that Friends do well to observe Christmas in a way that will most helpfully promote these ends.

There is perhaps a danger that gift-giving at Christmas time may become perverted from the noble purpose that it should serve, by being degraded into a fixed exchange of commodities, or a bestowal of gifts from a sense of equity to repay in value something received before. Friends may individually render their share of helpfulness in resisting the tendency toward gift giving without the heartfelt good will of the giver, and the establishment of a feeling of obligation in a custom which depends for its usefulness and beauty upon the spontaneous manifestation of affection, interest or sympathy. A beautiful custom which appeals to the better instincts of mankind ought to be safeguarded as far as possible against the dominion of worldliness and selfishness. With each returning Christmastide the hearts of men are more ready than at other seasons to be persuaded of the practical utility of the first Christmas anthem. Let us, in so far as in us lies, make use of the open door of opportunity to teach men the meaning of Christ's lowly life of loving and of giving.

THE FARM AS A LABORATORY.

Boys and girls from country homes to whom the way does not open to stay on at school and college to "complete" their education may find something to think about in what the distinguished biologist, Professor Whitman, has been saying about the farm as a biological laboratory. As quoted in an editorial in the "Independent" for Twelfth month 10th he says: "The study of living plants and animals, under control and cultivation, is what is now most needed for further advance in biology. We cannot hope to make much more progress in the study of the laws of heredity until we have the means of investigating the phenomena in the series of generations and under conditions that admit of decisive experimental tests." He believes that the biological farm is the next step in the study of nature. The further advance cannot be made in the biological laboratories of to-day because they are limited almost exclusively to the study of dead material.

The "Independent" quotes also President Jordan, who says, "The best thing a college can do for a young man is to bring him into the right sort of contact," and points out that the country home does this and also "furnishes the curious mind with the very best object lessons, to inspire the mind and purify the heart"; and the great thing about the country home is that it is not only a school of instruction but also of application. Every one of the sciences can be put into immediate practice. There is nothing to hinder even the application of mental science and mathematics. Arithmetic is not in its highest use in stocks and brokerage, but rather in the practical affairs of production; when applied to the problem of doubling the quantity of corn to the acre; or of improving the quality of potatoes or beans.

"While many of our ablest men," says the "Independent," "have been working in laboratories and museums, other equally great and able men have been plowing out, and hoeing out, and planting out some of the most important problems in life's history. . . . The problem now is to bring these two together. . . . The farm recognizes the value of the school, the school begins to recognize the value of the farm."

HERBERT SPENCER.

Four great English scientists, whose investigations have given a new trend to the world's thought, were Darwin, Tyndall, Huxley and Spencer. Of these, Herbert Spencer, who died last week in his 84th year, was perhaps the greatest. In his "Principles of Psychology," he stated the doctrine of evolution as the universal plan of all things, now accepted by leading theologians as well as by scientists, before Darwin had completed his plan of zoological evolution. To quote the Springfield Republican, Spencer taught that energy forever proceeds in one course: "That is, from the protoplasm or undifferentiated matter, through the monad, a simple cell, up to the great animal creation and man himself, who reasons of all:—from the atom up through the entire complexity of worlds. It is, as we have said, the reconciling idea; materialists cannot but find in it the substance of their beliefs; spiritualists equally discover in it the perfection of a divine life, which assuredly must work in this fashion, not making out of hand, as man makes his house or his steam engine, but simply living from one form into another, and into all forms, as it was in the beginning, is now and ever shall be, world without end." Tennyson gave poetic expression to the universal truth of Spencer's theology in his lines:

"Yet I doubt not through the ages one increasing purpose runs,
And the thoughts of man are widened in the process of the suns."

Spencer's "System of Synthetic Philosophy," published in ten volumes, appeals to students only, but his introductory work, "Study of Sociology," can be understood and enjoyed by the ordinary reader and would be a valuable book for First-day school workers. That part of his world-renowned treatise, "Education," which deals with moral training, should be read by every parent and teacher.

The reiterated charges that Spencer was an atheist showed a complete misunderstanding of the man on the part of his accusers; he did not deny the existence of God but simply declared that the great Power that pervades and controls the universe is "unknowable." While the faith that sufficed for him would be unsatisfying to most human hearts, "he was reverent of all things, all the processes of Nature from the ether and the star-dust in it to the orderly procession of the equinoxes and the highest of intelligences, which lies beyond the ken of man, that infinite energy which informs all with its one life, and moves with endless unfolding and continuous ethical purport through cycles in whose midst we only gaze and guess and wonder."

The day returns, and brings us the petty round of irritating concerns and duties. Help us to play the man, help us to perform them with laughter and kind faces, let cheerfulness abound with industry. Give us to go blithely on our business all this day, bring us to our resting beds weary and content and undishonored, and grant us in the end the gift of sleep. Amen.—[Robert Louis Stevenson.]

HALL.—Suddenly, on Twelfth month 10th, 1903, Edward W. Hall, of Mendenhall, Chester county, Pa., aged 73 years. Interment at Friends' burial-ground, south of West Chester, Pa.

He was a man who took great pleasure in the simple and the beautiful things of life, and enjoyed his home and his friends. He was industrious and possessed great integrity of character, and was faithful to the principles held by Friends.

McDANIEL.—Died, Eleventh month 5th, 1903, at the residence of her husband, William W. McDaniel, 909 West Seventh street, Wilmington, Del., Mary C. McDaniel, in her 49th year; a member of Wilmington Monthly Meeting; oldest child of Martin W. and Jane Meloney.

Her death resulted from pulmonary troubles of about seven months, which she bore with Christian patience. She at first was very desirous to regain her health and help to train their only child, a son 10 years old, but after a time became reconciled, leaving all to the will of her Heavenly Father, desiring to be released when it was his will. How precious a memory to parents, brothers and sister that their loss is her eternal gain.

OGDEN.—On Twelfth month 9th, 1903, at his home, Riverton, N. J., Edward H. Ogden, in his 72d year.

He was president of the Gandom Institute, president of the Consolidation National Bank, manager of Swarthmore College, and for several years chairman of its Finance and Building Committee, and trustee of the Endowment Fund, director of the Provident Life and Trust Company, president of the Preston Retreat, and president of the Riverton Saving Fund. In 1869 he entered the malting business as a member of the firm of Francis Perot's Sons, thus continuing the link of a firm that dates from 1687.

SHARPLESS.—Twelfth month 7th, 1903, of pneumonia, after an illness of about three days, Alfred Sharpless, in his 82d year. He was a son of Nathan H. Sharpless and Martha Price, his wife, and a grandson of Philip Price, who was several times a Superintendent of Westtown School.

Alfred lived a long, varied and active life, and withal was a kindly and tender-spirited man, devoted to the best interests of the community, his family and friends. He was a life-long member of West Chester Preparative Meeting of Friends.

WAY.—At his home in Hockessin, Del., on the morning of Tenth month 21st, 1903, Jasper Cope Way, in his 81st year; a member of Centre Monthly Meeting.

WHITE.—Near Langhorne, Pa., Twelfth month 9th, 1903, Tacy N., wife of Nathan B. White, in her 76th year. Though not a member of the Society of Friends was a regular attendant of First-day meetings for many years as long as her health permitted. Interred at Friends' burial-grounds, Langhorne.

WILLIAMS.—In Willistown, on Twelfth month 11th, 1903, Thomas H. Williams, in the 54th year of his age, son of the late William and Amy Hall Williams. Interment at Goshen Friends' burial-ground.

WRAY.—Suddenly, in Rochester, N. Y., Twelfth month 4th, 1903, Mary E., wife of G. Ellis Wray, youngest daughter of Edmund M. and Anna H. Carpenter, in her 40th year; a birthright member with Friends.

Thus while we wonder, weeping,
On the hidden yet to be,
We trust the Lord is keeping
Our loved ones still to be.

THE LESSON LEAVES.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

In an article written by Jesse H. Holmes, on "The Lesson Leaves," in INTELLIGENCER of Tenth month 17th, he asks, "Would it not be desirable to talk over, in the columns of the INTELLIGENCER, some of the matters connected therewith?" I fully agree to the need of "talking over" this subject which is of so much vital importance. With this end in view I wrote an article on the same subject for the INTELLIGENCER of Seventh month 19th, 1902. As far as I know my article did not cause much of a "talking over" the subject, though it was most heartily seconded and endorsed by Lydia J. Mosher, of Granville, N. Y., in the INTELLIGENCER of Seventh month 26th, 1902. But I hope there has been much thinking on the matter and that we will now hear expressions. The most vital question is, "Shall we return wholly to the International Topics?" At the General Conference, held at Lincoln, Virginia, it was decided that instead of continuing to use the portions of Scripture selected by the so-called International Committee, as a basis for the Lesson Leaves, Friends would have a committee of their own go to the same Bible and select topics for them. This arrangement stood till the Richmond Conference, when it was reported that some schools had lost heavily by the change. To save their further depletion it was decided that hereafter Friends should have leaves both on the topics selected by their own committee and those of the International Committee. This has never been satisfactory. It is frittering away our time, talents, and money on two series of lessons, when all is needed on one. Shall we continue this? I know of no other church, however large, so wasteful of its resources. Is it not far wiser to return wholly to the International Topics? Is it not all gain and no loss to do so? Some think this means that our lessons shall be prepared and served out to us by said International Committee. I recently heard an intelligent elder talk that way. Why any one can think so I do not know. Having a series of lessons of our own now prepared on said topics refutes this. And if they would examine the Lesson Leaves of the many churches that use these topics they would find that they all handle them differently. Our committee can do, as they are now doing—construct lessons to suit Friends views; only by concentrating their best efforts on the one series they can make it what it should be—an honor to the Church. By using the International Topics we can avail ourselves of the thought expressed on them by any, or all the other churches. How much better to have these helps than to undertake to build lessons with our own efforts solely. Besides, how much more Christian it looks to have some things in common with other Christians. Because we sometimes find thoughts in some of the lesson papers that don't suit us is certainly no reason why we should not use all of them that we like. Surely, as far as I have examined them, there is much more that is truly spiritual and uplifting than otherwise. They sometimes make mistakes, but all are liable to do so. I have sometimes seen thoughts in our own Lesson Leaves that were calculated to lower our love and respect for the Bible, instead of encouraging our children to frequently read it, as our Discipline inculcates.

But with the return to the International Topics, shall we have them for all classes? Most churches do; but they have lessons on them adapted to the different ages. I think this practicable and best, and I would have the Scripture for each lesson printed at its head. All other churches do, as far as I know. If only two pages are used for each lesson I would have them opposite so that all the lesson is before the reader without turning a leaf. And by all means publish lessons for every First-day in the year. Other churches do, and they generally have a review for the last First-day of each quarter. By doing the same we can keep in touch with them. We always have some schools in session. When we have many we should print many leaves—when few, print few; and, too, there are always some in those schools that are not in session who wish to study all the lessons. Not having lessons for every Sabbath is a loss to many. Numbering breaks all harmony—besides, there is inspiration in the thought that millions are with us in studying the same portions of the Scriptures at the same time. We should get all the hints we can from experts in Sabbath school work. We are comparatively young in the work. The International Committee, and most of those who prepare lessons for the schools of other churches, have spent a life time in trying to make their schools most efficient as nurseries of their churches. They have succeeded admirably. Our Church needs such a nursery, and needs it badly. We are all aiming for the same goal. Shall we avail ourselves of the immense help we can get by co-operating with these experts in the work, or shall we selfishly cut entirely adrift from other Christian workers in the blessed Sabbath school work? I truly believe the one course means an uplifting in all spiritual growth—the other standing still or retrogression.

FROM EDWARD COALE.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

AFTER much planning and overcoming numerous discouragements we find ourselves (my wife and daughter being with me) at this place for the winter. We left home on the 21st of Eleventh month, stopping two days with a son in Peoria, Ill., and arriving here on the 27th nearly worn out on our long ride of three and a half days and four nights. Our Pullman was very comfortable and officials kind and attentive, as the employees of the great Santa Fe always are. Before going further permit me to pay a just tribute to the memory of our dear friend Joshua L. Mills of Clear Creek, Illinois. I attended his funeral just a few days before we left home. Having been associated with him so much in our society work and social intercourse the loss comes very close home, not to me only but to our entire Yearly Meeting—always prompt in the attendance of meetings far and near, which during the last year required over twelve hundred miles travel. Not only local is his loss, but like that of our dear brother, Howard M. Jenkins, his loss is felt by our whole Society.

Our journey was without especial incident except that we were on the road Thanksgiving day, and some of our fellow passengers learning that I was a minister insisted on holding a thanksgiving service and my leading it. There were only two courses to take, either to comply or to refuse to enter the open door that I was not instrumental in opening; so of course the effort must be made. Several denominations were represented. The service began by singing, which soon drew the entire company to our end of the car, and several from other cars. This was followed by Bible reading, prayer and an address. Songs were interspersed, and numerous thanksgiving testimonies were borne, closing with solemn, impressive prayer. It seemed strange, away out on the mountain and desert waste of Arizona, amid the rumbling and roaring of the rushing train, that we strangers to each other, feeling the drawing ties of Christian fellowship, should be willing to blend our voices thus in thanksgiving and praise. We were glad the effort was made.

We have a son, and my wife has a sister here, and we anticipate a pleasant winter. A great profusion of flowers, ripe and ripening fruits and vegetables are everywhere to be seen.

It was our privilege to-day to attend Friends' Church, where we listened to an exceedingly zealous discourse on Zeal, especially as applied to Christian life, in which many forceful and impressive points were made. I was invited to the pulpit, but declined, feeling very keenly the effect of our long journey, though otherwise I would have had no objection to complying.

John Henry Douglas lives here and was at meeting to-day but did not preach. We felt the better for going and will go again. The cordial hearty handshake so characteristic with every phase of the Society of Friends is not lacking here, and in silence does an effective work. We hope to be able to move around among Friends somewhat and you may hear from us again. We represent the tourists of moderate means, and our going will be measured by the capacity of our pocket book. The distance from Los Angeles to San Francisco is nearly five hundred miles. For the closing exercises of the Woodstown, N. J., First-day school, Twelfth month 13th, after the individual texts had been given, a short memorial exercise was held for Isaac H. Hillborn. Sarah B. Peterson read the editorial referring to him in FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER, and several bore testimony to the love and high regard in which he was held at Woodstown. Pleasant memories of the past were recalled, and when the children were asked how many remembered him nearly every hand went up. An impressive silence followed and the school adjourned.

Ten members of the Conference Committee on the preparation of First-day school lessons met at Fifteenth and Race streets, Philadelphia, Seventh-day afternoon and evening. They had an interesting and profitable session. A tentative outline of the plan upon which they are working will be given next week, so that others who are interested may make helpful suggestions.

Alfred Moore, an Orthodox Friend, filed exceptions in Common Pleas Court, No. 5, to-day to the granting of a charter to the "Friends' Beneficial Society of Pennsylvania," the application for incorporation of which is being heard by David Lavis, as master.

Alfred Moore files the exceptions on behalf of himself and of such other members of his sect as may hereafter join in the exceptions. The chief objection to the incorporation of the new society is directed against the use of the word "Friends" in its title.

He declares that as the corporators of the association are not Friends, in the sense of being Quakers, and have no connection with that religious body, the use of the word in the title is misleading and will tend to confuse the public and may reflect disadvantageously upon the society.—[Philadelphia Ledger.]

THE reduced production of cotton in America has stimulated efforts to raise it in Africa, Asia and South America, England and Germany being especially active in seeking new sources of cotton supply in their own colonies.

THE MINISTRY OF FRIENDS IN ENGLAND.

"When these difficulties have been met, and the step taken, we are not confident that any gain has resulted, in the majority of instances, either to the Society or to the individual concerned. As an encouragement to the minister, such recognition is a failure, because it has been in most cases so long delayed that it has caused often more of discouragement than of the reverse, and has come only after the early hesitations, doubts, and fears have been largely lived down, and confidence in the service of the Master has become established.

"There is, too, a distinct danger that a recorded minister, seated in a gallery facing the congregation, comes to feel his or her position in these respects as a call to preach, and in this way feels a responsibility, and enters upon service beyond that ordered by the Spirit of God.

"Looked at from the point of view of the congregation rather than of the minister, the case is more serious still. It is here we come in sight of what, to many of us, is a fatal blot on the present practice. Some of our meetings have suffered, and life in them is being dwarfed to-day because of a system which tends to center in a few a service the responsibility for which should be felt by all, without any limits or distinctions of man's arranging. . . . After more than twenty years' experience of some measure of service in the vocal ministry of our meetings, the writer is bound to confess that when entering a meeting with a 'strong gallery' the sense of personal responsibility is wont, even now, in large measure to depart from him. Must not this be experienced to a much greater extent by the younger members of our meetings, whose service is a necessity to the vigorous and progressive life of the Church?

"A further objection is that the existence of a system which causes anyone with a special gift for vocal ministry to be known as a 'minister' tends to exalt this particular service, at the expense of the ministry of life. 'Ministry,' in its true sense, is too large a gift to be restricted to any one class of service, or any individual member of Christ's Church. Christian ministry is wide as human life and service, and anything that causes it to mean less tends towards poverty."

As to the reconstruction of the present system the writer is "not clear that, beyond possibly some strengthening of the eldership, anything is necessary." The suggestion that the list of recorded ministers should be periodically revised, would, he thinks, if adopted, leave things practically unchanged. "The difficulties that now prevent 'recording' in so many cases would be in no way removed; and practically persons once 'recorded' would remain on the list for life."

In the London Friend for Eighth month 7th, Georgina King Lewis writes on the subject, "I cannot refrain from emphasizing my deep conviction that we shall be deluding ourselves altogether if we hold the idea that the healthy condition of our meetings for worship is going to be insured by dropping the system of recording approval of the spoken word. Where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty—liberty to speak and liberty to keep silence; and if we feel as Paul did, and I see no other justification for speaking, that 'necessity is laid upon me; yea, woe is me if I preach not the gospel,' we shall not be influenced by any other motive. The failure we mourn, and the variety of opinion on this subject of recording is an indication of weakness that is not going to pass away simply by ceasing to record. At the same time it is 'a very small thing' to be judged by man's judgment, and to prove that we do not place importance on outward organization I trust that the practice will be discontinued, and that those who are recorded will be as those who are not, that we may the more steadily look for the Divine approval on our ministry and the baptism which alone can make us able ministers of the word."

The British Friend for Eighth month has an article by William Edward Turner on "The Church and the Ministry," with an answer to it by the editor.

W. E. Turner hopes "that no hasty change will be made without a clear view that a better position—a more helpful and constructive policy—can be assured to the Church."

"We often hear complaints about inefficient and unhelpful preaching, and of the need of a deeper, more comprehensive and instructive ministry. Do Friends expect to produce a better-equipped body of ministers by external changes which can have but little connection with spiritual development? . . .

"Some of us who are no longer young, but who can recall how much the sympathy of the Church meant to us in the early days of our ministry, may well be excused if we ask our brethren to pause ere they seek to abolish a simple spiritual order, unless and until they are able to offer an effective constructive substitute for maintaining the responsibility of the Church, and securing that the liberty of the individual shall not degenerate into caprice."

The editor of the British Friend, in reply to this article, said, "We gladly make way for this statement of a position which is not ours, in the earnest desire that the subject may be looked at on all sides. . . .

We believe that an effective substitute [for the recording system] could be found in an extension of the eldership both in personnel and in duties. Let us have a committee of elders who really represent the thoughtful and spiritually-minded in our congregations; let them meet frequently, and convey from time to time collective but private messages of sympathy and encouragement to those who are speaking helpfully, even if briefly and infrequently; of advice to those who 'are going beyond the measure of their gift,' or not using it to the best advantage; of loving desire that those who seem to have a gift, but to be neglecting it, may be faithful to the Divine requirements. In such ways we believe the Church can control and foster the ministry far better than it does at present."

In the Friend for Ninth month 18th there appears an editorial on the subject of the Gospel ministry, devoted in great part to summing up and weighing the arguments that have been brought out in the letters that have appeared on the subject in the columns of the Friend. The writer of this editorial says, "One conclusion is clear, namely, that the ministry of the Gospel among us is such as to make urgent need for the approaching conference. Secondly, the terms of reference from the yearly meeting are clear—carefully to review the whole subject of the condition of the ministry as now recognized amongst us, especially as it is affected by the regulations of our discipline." Thirdly, it is manifest that 'widespread discontent' exists respecting the present arrangements for the ministry among us. Fourthly, the discussion shows that while the question of the recognition of ministers is a complex problem in the minds of Friends, there lies at the back of it the much larger and wider problem of the actual condition of the ministry itself and of the mind of our community towards it. . . .

"While it is evident that there must in good order be some recognition of gifts, it is also evident . . . that the recognition at the present time needs serious modifications. . . . That it is injurious to do anything which shall create a class for life must commend itself to all, but the simple act of recognition of a gift cannot in itself create a class. That many serious inequalities exist is manifest. But we may not sacrifice right lines of action because of inequalities in the conduct of independent monthly meetings."

PENNSYLVANIA PEACE SOCIETY.

PUBLIC meetings were held in the auditorium of the Young Friends' Association Building on the afternoon and evening of the 8th, to commemorate the 37th anniversary of the Pennsylvania Peace Society. The opening address in the afternoon was made by the President, Hon. William N. Ashman. Dr. Rebecca Moore read an address, "Man versus Country." The orator of the afternoon was Scott F. Hershey, Ph.D., LL.D., Boston, Mass.

The attendance in the evening was larger than usual and the program was full of interest. The singing of the "Peace Rallying Song," led by Professor Batchelor, was as enthusiastic as could be expected in an audience composed mostly of Friends whose musical education had been neglected. Rev. Matthew Anderson (colored) gave interesting "Echoes from Rouen Peace Congress," to which he was a delegate. He said that nowhere in Europe did he and his wife suffer any inconvenience because of their color. An enjoyable reading was then given by Vera Anita Bailey.

Charles Wood, D.D., in an address in which he argued that men are not yet ready to dispense with force said: "It is tremendously significant when a man like Professor Fiske, of Harvard, should say that the time is coming when every vestige of strife and all the feelings which accompany an age of strife, shall disappear forever. Isn't that only the vision of the Hebrew prophet? The spiritual prophet and the scientific prophet stand at last on the same platform and are looking forward to the same consummation."

Henry W. Wilbur, in an address which illustrated his argument, said: "The advocate of peace is not a forceless being, but a being who believes in force. . . . The peace man believes in constructive force; he disbelieves in destructive force. . . . The only force in the world which counts in the long run is the moral force which inheres in a consecrated soul on fire with a sublime conviction. Men and women of this stamp have been the ones who have moved the world."

TO PREVENT THE SHIPPING OF LIQUOR INTO "DRY" COMMUNITIES.

No more important general legislation affecting the temperance question has been proposed for over a decade than the Hepburn (H. R. 4072) Dölliver Bill (Senate 1390). This measure is simply designed to make state legislation on the liquor question effective by allowing the laws of the state to have complete jurisdiction over liquor shipped into the state both before and after delivery. Prohibition, whether state wide or local, and all forms of local option legislation will not have a fair test without this law. The bill is before the Judiciary Committee in both houses of Congress.

The special thing desired now is that those interested in the passage of this bill write short, courteous appeals to Senators and Congressmen on the Committees and to the Congressman of the writer's district to do everything in their power to secure the prompt and favorable consideration of the measure by the Committees and its early passage in both branches. For this purpose the names of the Committee in Senate and House are herewith appended.

Senate Judiciary Committee: George F. Hoar, Mass.; Orville M. Platt, Conn.; Clarence D. Clark, Wyo.; Charles W. Fairbanks, Ind.; Knute Nelson, Minn.; Louis E. McComas, Maryland; Chauncey M. Depew, New York; John H. Mitchell, Ore.; Augustus O. Bacon, Georgia; Edmund W. Pettus, Ala.; Charles A. Culberson, Texas; Joseph C. S. Blackburn, Ky.; Thomas M. Patterson, Colo.

House Judiciary Committee: John J. Jenkins, Wis.; Richard W. Parker, New Jersey; De Alva S. Alexander, New York; Vespasian Warner, Ill.; Charles E. Littlefield, Maine; Lot Thomas, Iowa; Samuel L. Powers, Mass.; Robert M. Nevin, Ohio; Henry W. Palmer, Penna.; George A. Pearre, Maryland; James N. Gillett, Cal.; David A. De Armond, Mo.; David H. Smith, Kentucky; Henry D. Clayton, Ala.; Robert L. Henry, Texas; John S. Little, Ark.; William C. Bentley, Georgia.

THE FRIENDS' CENTRAL SCHOOL (PHILADELPHIA). OLD PUPILS' ASSOCIATION.

THE annual business meeting of the Old Pupils' Association of Friends' Central School was held in the School Lecture Room, Fifteenth and Race streets, Philadelphia, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon of Eleventh month 30th. About 70 members attended, and a live interest in the affairs of the Association was exhibited.

Change in the constitution was provided for, allowing 12 members on the Executive Committee instead of 9, as heretofore, and establishing the office of assistant registrar.

In the report of the Executive Committee mention was made of the death of Aaron B. Ivins, Honorary President of the Association, which occurred Second month 13th, 1903, his loss being keenly felt by the membership.

It was reported that in Second month last a lecture by Professor Heilprin on Mt. Pelée was given under the care of the Committee. It was recommended that a similar entertainment and educational feature once a year should become a regular event and part of the privileges of membership in the Association.

The invested funds of the Association amount to $1,500, the interest on which is available for the expenses of the Association.

It was suggested that the day of the spring sports of the school in Fifth month be made regularly an Old Pupils' Day as it was last spring.

Members were reminded that they could assist the pupils of the school very materially by subscribing to the school magazine, which appears monthly for nine issues each year. The Executive Committee had made this paper its official organ.

To secure for the school a suitable piece of ground as a gift, or on a long lease at a nominal sum for out-door athletic work was mentioned as an opportunity for interested well-to-do friends or former pupils. The students of the school are doing good work in athletics, although they are more or less handicapped by far distant grounds which can be rented for short periods only.

Other suggestions for work that might be undertaken by the Association, individually or as an organization were: the providing a fund for enlarging the gymnasium and a room for manual training work; an endowment fund, the Association already having $500 that could be made a nucleus; the securing of scholarships from various colleges. The school already has a number of scholarships, and it was thought that others might be secured in the University of Pennsylvania, Swarthmore, Bryn Mawr, Haverford, Princeton and possibly Yale, Harvard and Cornell.

The two objects for the existence of the Association are: the pleasure of reunion with old classmates; and to be of benefit to Friends' Central School.

The report of the Registrar showed a membership of 746, of whom 45 are life members. This is an increase of 230 during the year.

The treasurer's report showed $1,500 invested funds, and $1,152.62 cash on hand. The life membership subscriptions are nearly all invested and further investments will be made as way opens.

The following officers were elected: President, George L. Mitchell; first vice-president, Annie Shoemaker; second vice-president, George J. Watson; secretary, Sarah Sellers Bunting; treasurer, A. Morton Cooper; registrar, Mary Westcott Young; assistant registrar, Alice W. Pitman; executive committee, William Wharton, Jr., Carrie G. Buzby, John L. Carver, Mary B. McIlvain, Thomas P. Bacon, Emma Walter, J. Howard Mitchell, Jennie Ambler Way, Robert C. Lippincott, Ellen Linton Sellers, Hugh McIlvain, Joseph C. Emley.

The following evening, Twelfth month 1st, the Annual Reunion and Supper was held at Horticultural Hall. Nearly 700 former pupils and guests assembled and were greeted and made to feel at home by the Reception Committee, among whom were the following: Thomas P. Bacon and wife, John Baird, Joseph Bosler and wife, of Ogontz, George L. Mitchell and wife, Edmund Webster and wife, Frank R. Toby, Dr. James B. Walker, Hugh B. Eastburn, Harry A. Gatchell, John H. Hampton, Jr., from New York, Abram W. Harris from Port Deposit, Maryland, Robert M. Janney, Hugh McIlvain and wife, J. Eugene Baker, G. Plantou Middleton and wife, Dr. Henry K. Pancoast, Llewellyn T. McKee, Fred Taylor Pusey, Howard B. French, William G. Foulke, Isaac P. Mather, Frank L. Neall, Alfred Moore, President Joseph W. Swain and wife, George J. Watson and wife, A. Morton Cooper and wife, Robert C. Lippincott, William Wharton, Jr., B. Frank Betts and wife, Thomas Shallcross, Jr., Dr. James Tyson, George Pierson and wife, S. Raymond Roberts, William Wright and wife, A. Howard Old, J. Gibson McIlvain, Joseph T. Bunting. The social character was maintained throughout, and a most charming evening was spent in the company of congenial companions and acquaintances. During the evening, the President of the Association, George L. Mitchell, '78, introduced Professor William W. Birdsall, who addressed the assembly briefly, speaking of the sturdy, thorough education that Friends had ever required for their children, and the present aims of the Friends' Central School, as well as its past history. His remarks were appreciated and most favorably received. An orchestra furnished music during the evening and the supper was served in the main hall, adding much to the friendly character of the occasion. Among those present were several who had entered as pupils the first day the school opened in 1845. Many of the guests had traveled from afar to be present at its Reunion, and from all appearances enjoyed the occasion immensely. The Association has every reason to be encouraged at its growth and the interest shown by its members individually.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE.

The Joseph Leidy Society met Third-day, Twelfth month 8th, and the officers for the first Semester were elected as follows: A. M. Taylor, Pres.; Herbert Thatcher, Vice-pres.; Jeannette Curtis, Sec. The exercises consisted of lectures and talks on "Early Telescopes," "Osmotic Pressure," "Geological Additions to Nova Scotia," and "Lighting and Heating a Modern House." The meeting was well attended and interesting throughout.

Percy Bigland, the English artist who painted the "Quaker Wedding," spoke to the student body in Fifth-day morning collection. He commended highly the practice of getting together in silence for a little while every morning. Speaking of his life in England he told an anecdote about his children and a little girl who was educated with them. He said that the child had drawn a beautiful little picture one morning, a picture with a wall dividing it into halves and on one side of the wall she had painted all that was beautiful, the flowers and smiling people, and on the other side dead grass and frowning, busy people. Then she changed it and the wall melted away and the people mingled and all were very happy. And when Mr. Bigland asked her what had happened, she said that the happy people had spoken kindly to the unhappy people and the wall, which was only of snow, was melted by warm friendship. Thus he illustrated the power of kindness. His address was very much appreciated.

Prof. Hayes is issuing for the holidays a humorous story, "A Day in a Brandyvine Harvest Field," which is the first of a series of prose tales dealing with Chester county rural folk and landscape.

Recently, Prof. Hayes gave a "Chaucer Reading" at the Century Club of West Chester. On the 10th inst., he spoke at the West Chester High School on the historical and literary associations of Chester County and of the various types of character among people there.

Sixth-day, Twelfth month 11th, the Dickinson debating team met the Swarthmore team. The question, "Resolved that the municipalities of the United States should own and operate their street railways." The decision was given to Dickinson, who had the negative side of the question. The debate was very spirited and many thought that Swarthmore had the better of the argument.

First-day, Twelfth month 13th, Beatrice Magill read a very impressive paper before the meeting. She spoke of the power of peace in a life rough and difficult, telling how it above all strengthened and uplifted the busy mind. In illustration she read a poem which beautifully pictured the calm of the under sea during a violent storm on its surface.

In Bible class Dr. Holmes spoke of the idea of reward. The question turned to athletics and it was thought that athletics often failed in its highest aim, which is to render a man strong and also to give rest from the pressure of business life.

Dr. Swain will speak before the Washington Young Friends' Association on First-day, Twelfth month 13th. On the following day he will address the Friends' School of Washington, while on Third-day he intends to lecture before the Baltimore Friends' School.

In Memoriam—Waldie Koethen.—The Faculty of Swarthmore College desire to express their profound sorrow in the death of Waldie Koethen, a member of the Freshman Class. He was an excellent student, a young man of fine character, high purposes and ideals of life. In the short time he was in Swarthmore he won the confidence and esteem of his fellow students and the respect and admiration of his teachers. That he possessed these high qualities must be a consolation to his family and friends in this hour of their bereavement. In the Providence of God may his early departure from this life impress on those who remain that it is the things of the Spirit which abide, and such virtues as were possessed by our young friend cannot be lost.

FRIENDS' ASSOCIATIONS.

WOODLAWN, VA.—The Young Friends' Association met at the home of Anna S. Walton, Eleventh month 20th, with a good attendance. The president read the 112th Psalm, and after the reading of the minutes Mary Lukenus read a portion of Henry Ward Beecher's "Industry and Idleness." "A hearty industry promotes happiness, and health is the platform on which all happiness must be built. The poor man with industry is happier than the rich man in idleness, for labor makes the one more manly and riches unman the other. Industry gives character and credit to the young." After some discussion the Association took up the subject of the proposed change in the lesson leaves. The outline of the proposed change, and a paper written by Charles Clevenger and read at the Woodlawn First-day School Union, were read. After much discussion on the subject the general opinion seemed to be that for our First-day school what is needed is a return to International topics, prepared according to Friends' principles. The argument for this was that such return would tend to make us more liberal. Dorothy Walton then recited a Thanksgiving poem, and after recess and roll-call Louise Walton read a biography of Miriam Gover. Francis Wilkinson read two short but very good selections, "Be Worth Knowing," and "Too Busy to be Kind." Because of the late hour the reading of the "Penns and Peningtons" was omitted for the evening. The program for next month was read, and after a short silence the meeting adjourned to meet at the home of Lewis Gillingham, Twelfth month 27th.

LIDA W. GILLINGHAM, Secretary.

CINCINNATI, O.—The Cincinnati Friends' Association met at the home of Sarah Lippincott, Eleventh month 29th. The silence at the opening of the meeting was followed by a Scripture reading by the clerk.

The topic for the afternoon was "The Power of Silence." The reading by Prof. J. Edward Harry, of the University of Cincinnati, was taken from H. W. Dresser's book on the subject. The book is an interpretation of life in its relation to health and happiness, and the selections read showed the importance of education of the truer sort, which brings poise, develops individuality, and gives health and strength of both intellect and body. The most difficult achievements may be accomplished by combining repose with power. We have not yet learned the power and supremacy of the Spirit, nor the value of quiet, systematic thinking. We are unaware of the power and value of a few moments of silence.

The meeting closed with the reading by Rebecca Hopkins of a poem, called "Aspiration."

GRACE D. HALL, Ass't Clerk.

COLUMBUS, O.—The Friends' Association met at the home of John E. Carpenter, with twenty members present. The meeting opened with the reading of a portion of the "Sermon on the Mount," after which there was a short period of silent waiting.

A communication of encouragement and sympathy from the Young Friends' Association of Short Creek, Ohio, Quarterly Meeting was received, which brought forth many expressions of appreciation.

William B. Hersey read a paper portraying the life and character of George Fox from childhood to old age, which was listened to with great interest. A discussion followed on the subject of conscience and the inner light.

After listening to a poem read by Isaac Butterworth, the meeting adjourned to meet at his home First month 3d, 1904.

BALTIMORE, MD.—The third regular meeting of Baltimore Young Friends' Association for the season of 1903-4 was held in the library of Park Ave. Meeting-house, Sixth-day evening, Twelfth month 11th, 1903.

The meeting was opened by the reading of the nineteenth Psalm by William S. Pike. The secretary read the minutes of the last meeting. Emma J. Broomell, the delegate to the General Conference, gave a brief report of its proceedings. Joseph J. Janney gave a comprehensive and graphic sketch of the period of the separation. Anna B. Smedley read an excellent paper upon "The Outlook and Duty of Friends for the Twentieth Century."

The meeting adjourned, and the remainder of the evening was spent in the enjoyment of a short entertainment prepared by the Social Committee.

HELEN H. ELY, Sec.

MOORESTOWN, N. J.—A regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association was held on Twelfth month 11th, 1903, in Friends' Meeting-house. The delegates who represented us at Wilmington gave their report. The program for the evening was a talk by Dr. Jesse Holmes on "The Meaning of Evolution." He started his talk by defining evolution and he told us that instead of its meaning Darwinism as so many think, it really refers to universal progress and the process by which things pass from like to unlike and develop along their different lines. He said there were three main ways in which evolution took place: First, a progressive change, such as the earth in its orbit, or people in their movements, and there has been constantly a concentration toward the centre. Second was the change according to some law, as the perpetual change in nature and in animal life, according to some law. The growth of society is in an orderly direction, tending toward self-government. Third and last, was the change in cycles. There would be a wave of development and then another wave. Dr. Holmes also spoke of the death of the great scientist, Herbert Spencer, who was one of the greatest classifiers of facts of this age. After a few remarks and a brief silence, the meeting adjourned.

ANNA B. DUDLEY, Secretary.

PLAINFIELD, N. J.—The Young Friends' Association met Twelfth month 2d, 1903. The subject for the evening was Elizabeth Fry; a sketch of her life and work was read showing her to be one of the pioneers of Religious Liberty and one of the foremost in Prison Reforms. The 107 Psalm was read at the opening of the meeting, it having been the favorite psalm of Elizabeth Fry. Our delegate to the General Conference held at Wilmington, Del., gave a very interesting account of the meetings. Current Topics told of Friends erecting a monument to the "Early Friends" on Boston Commons. At roll call short selections were given.

MARIETTA V. ADAMS, Cor. Sec.

LANGHORNE, PA.—A regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association was held at the home of Alfred Marshall, Eleventh month 20th, 1903. The program for the evening opened with a reading by Marion Osmond, entitled, "The Optimistic View of the New Year." Headley White then gave a recitation. President Joseph Swain, of Swarthmore, addressed the meeting. His subject was "A View of Nature and the Bible." Dr. Harvey Lovell opened the discussion which followed. He said that criticism of the Bible might lead to irreverence. Ada B. Mitchell said the more religious we become the more we see God's work in nature. William Ivins gave the thought that the truths that we find in the Bible existed long before they were first written by the philosopher Moses.

MABEL A. ROW, Secretary.

BYBERRY, PA.—On First-day afternoon, the 6th, a joint meeting of the Young Friends' Association and Abington Philanthropic Committee was held, with nearly a hundred interested friends in attendance. The Scripture reading was given by Elizabeth Parry, and after the reading of the minutes of the previous session, the report of the nominating committee was given. The new officers reported and accepted are as follows: President, James Bonner, Jr.; vice-president and treasurer, John Wood; secretary, Anna Hawkins; executive committee, Rachel Johnson, Gertrude Tomlinson, J. Byron Wood and Lilian Shoemaker. The report of the delegates to Wilmington Conference was then given, five of the six appointed having attended. Carrie J. Atkinson gave a review of the morning's proceedings and Arabella Carter of the afternoon. The treasurer's report was then read.

The attention of the meeting was then given to an address by Lucretia L. Blankenburg on "What Friends have done for the Advancement of Women." She gave a very interesting account of the Society's rise, and its attitude toward women all along; of the establishment of first school for women by George Fox; of the separate yearly meetings in 1773; of the worthy women who preached the gospel in the early days. She also dwelt to some extent on the establishment of early meeting-houses in and around Philadelphia, and ended with a short list of the most notable women in the Society, both in the past and the present day. The fact that women Friends were progressive was shown, in that five out of the eight composing the first graduating class from Women's Medical College, were members of the Society. Remarks of appreciation and of inquiry were voiced by Nathaniel Richardson, Sarah C. James, Edward Comly and Arabella Carter.

Minutes of last Philanthropic Conference were read at this time. John Wood then read "Death of the Flowers," and the program for next meeting being read showed it would be a Benjamin Hallowell meeting. After a short silence the meeting adjourned. A. C.

WEST CHESTER, PA.—The Young Friends' Association of West Chester held its second meeting of the term Eleventh month 25th, 1903.

The chief topic of the evening was a paper entitled "Friends' in Business," read by Lewis K. Stubbs. In speaking of the Friends' methods in the earlier days, we must consider the natural changes in the environments of the people in the earlier stages and those of the present time.

In our business intercourse with each other and as we go forth into this industrial and scientific world, which is ever leading us onward, we must still remember the rights of others. Robbery is still robbery, and a lie is still a lie in the business way, just as it formerly was. We find it just as necessary to remember Christ's Sermon on the Mount and Lucretia Mott's motto for daily living.

The methods of William Penn may be considered an ideal business method, for while Penn's treaty with the Indians was never ratified by an oath, yet it was always respected. He upheld the dignity of the Commonwealth in later transactions quoted, yet triumphed in the end. Let us refer to the early Friends' fidelity and principle in the matter of slavery and military service. This illustrates the power of our example. There is the need and always will be for a vigorous practice of the simple doctrine of uprightness in our business life, for a rigid adherence to the truth in its minutest detail, for the refusal to take unfair advantage, and for a determination to assist others to rise instead of rising ourselves by their misfortune. If friends are such a people, then only are we worthy of the noble, priceless heritage that is ours, and then are we doing something to strengthen and sustain the beautiful structure of our society that has been erected at such a great cost.

LITERARY NOTES.

A beautiful little book is "Brandywine Days," a series of stories by Professor J. Russell Hayes of Swarthmore College, in which he portrays rural humors and quaint sayings and Brandywine farm scenes and landscape. Here is a glimpse from one of the stories, "In a Brandywine Harvest Field":

Lem Smith loaded the sheaves in regular layers around the wagon, while Sam and Ben pitched from either side. The trusty horses moved from pile to pile of sheaves around the sides of the field. When the load was complete, Sam mounted and drove, and Lem lay back on the oats and watched the white cloud islands, while Ben touched the brakes at the back. Thus they came rumbling down the hill with a screeching of locked wheels and enveloped in a fog of gray dust, rolled swiftly up the barn bridge, and finally tossed the rich burden off into the wide mows. Across the hills other men were performing the same harvest operations in other fields; and in that fair seven-mile valley there was being enacted one of the epics of labor,—man gleaning from the bosom of Mother Earth bounteous sustenance for the winter to come,—the ancient, homely, eternal theme of the poets, from Virgil, singing so affectionately of to our English Spenser and Herrick and their followers.

As the men descended with their third load they saw a wide straw hat slowly moving among the corn-tassels in the next field below, and soon Reuben Dawley emerged from the edge of the little green wilderness.

"I see you boys up here," called the old man, "and the fish nout bitin' heavy,—thinks I, I'll just go up an' look on a spell."

"Well, set down under that tree, Uncle Rube, an' rest yerself till we come along back," Sam said to him.

"Yes," added Ben, "rest yerself, Uncle Rube; I reckon you'll not object to doin' that." And the wagon disappeared in a whirl of dust.

To those who have not met Reuben Dawley I must say that he is our staunch and tireless old angler, beloved of everybody in and about Slumberton. Indeed, his fame as a fisherman has reached even unto West Chester, for the old man treasures a certain little printed slip which he has pasted in the back of his complete Angler. It is a cutting from the Daily Vocal in which the genial editor said:

"Uncle Reuben Dawley, the Izaak Walton of Slumberton, came into our office yesterday and left an eight-pound carp, of his own catching. Call again, Reuben!"

HERBERT SPENCER.

HE is not dead; his mighty thought still lives,
And shall live through the ages yet to come.
Our tongues most eloquent seem strangely dumb
To tell what he to human knowledge gives.

Wallace and Darwin both discerned the law,
By which all life develops, change on change,—
He caught their light and with the wider range
Of stronger sight, the universe he saw.

Alive with evolution! Man, no more
Content with childish legends from the past,
Observes, compares, stands up erect at last,
And finds but myths his fathers' cherished lore!

Spencer, with laurel I would crown thy head,
For thou hast conquered, not an alien race,
But age-long ignorance, and in thy place
Thou stands't immortal; No, thou art not dead!

CURRENT EVENTS.

At the request of the Harvard Faculty a conference of those interested in football was called and the question whether the great college football contests should be continued was frankly and thoroughly discussed. The consensus of opinion was to the effect that the game had improved in many of its features in recent years; that the feeling between opposing teams, and particularly between Harvard and Yale, was of a friendly nature, and that an effort should be made to modify certain apparently objectionable features. The opinion was expressed that the game of football is only one of many distractions in college life, and that there is no evidence that its abolition would necessarily turn the attention of students to more serious pursuits. It was felt that Harvard is not yet ready to give up the game.

THE Norwegian Parliament has awarded the annual Nobel Peace prize, $39,150, to William R. Cremer, M. P., for his work in behalf of international arbitration. William Randal Cremer is the founder of the Inter-Parliamentary Conferences, which have met since 1888 at Paris, London, Rome, Berne, The Hague, Budapest, Brussels and Christiania. He took an active part in agitating for a treaty of arbitration between Great Britain and the United States, visiting the country three times and presenting memorials to the President and Congress from members of the House of Commons in favor of such a treaty.

For twenty-eight years W. R. Cremer has been Secretary of the International Arbitration League, and is editor and publisher of the Arbitrator. In order to advocate international arbitration he has visited every country of Europe.

At the 23d annual meeting of the National Civil Service Reform Association held in Baltimore last week, the statement was made that of the thirteen public servants indicted for crime in the Postoffice investigation, not one originally entered the service through a competitive examination. Richard Henry Dana, in discussing municipal appointments, said that in Paris, one of the best governed cities in the world, they have put the heads of the departments, and those near the head, under the merit system, leaving them free to choose their subordinates. In America we have put the subordinate officers under the merit system and have left the heads of departments in politics.

THE annual report of the United States Indian Inspector for Indian Territory says that the five civilized tribes in the Territory, including Indians and freedmen, number 84,000 persons, who hold over 19,000,000 acres of land. There was a material increase in population in the Territory. The duty of the Government is shown under legislation and agreements to allot in severalty the land of the five civilized tribes after town sites and other reservations have been made and to wind up the tribal affairs, limiting the life of the tribal governments to March 4th, 1906.

THE first annual report of Secretary Cortelyou, of the Department of Commerce and Labor, is necessarily more a plan of work for the future than an account of results accomplished. As a result of the killing of seals on the Fribiloff Islands, 19,292 sealskins were taken for 1903, this being 3,904 less than in 1902. The Interstate Commerce Commission, now incorporated in this department, reports the casualties on the railroads of the United States for the last fiscal year, killed, 3,554; wounded, 45,477.

H. CLAY TRUMBULL, for thirty years editor of the Sunday School Times, died at his home in Philadelphia on the 9th. As early as 1858 he began Sunday school work, becoming a Sunday school missionary for the Connecticut State Association. During the Civil War he was a chaplain and was confined in Libby Prison. Four of his books originated in his army experiences. At the end of the war he became missionary superintendent for New England of the American Sunday School Union. In 1875 he went to Philadelphia to take charge of the Sunday School Times. He is the author of many books and studies, among them "Teachers and Teaching," and the "Yale Lectures on the Sunday School." Among the honorary pall-bearers at his funeral were Judge W. N. Ashman, Rufus M. Jones, Isaac H. Clothier, John H. Converse, John Wanamaker.

THE estimate of government expenses for the coming year sent to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury aggregate $624,502,146.

NEWS NOTES.

CHICAGO has been decided upon as the place of meeting of the Republican National Convention, Sixth month 21st, 1904.

THE Ohio Commission on Uniform Laws has filed its report with the Governor, recommending an act to establish a law uniform with the law of other States relative to migratory divorce.

THE struggle in the Hungarian Parliament has at last been brought to a close, and there are hopes now of bringing to a settlement the question as to the compromise agreement between Austria and Hungary.

THE new schemes for peasant reforms in Russia are to be referred to an elective body composed of prominent committees—an entirely new departure for Russia that may be a step toward a Russian Parliament.

GENERAL TZONTCHEFF, the Macedonian leader, left Vienna on the 10th for Paris. He will later go to London, and it is possible that he will visit the United States. He believes that war between Bulgaria and Turkey in the spring is inevitable.

FINANCIAL difficulties, which began with the Dowie crusade to New York, have culminated in Zion City going into the hands of receivers. Later the creditors declared Dowie solvent and succeeded in getting him out of the bankruptcy court.

JUDSON W. LYONS, the negro National Committeeman from Georgia and Register of the United States Treasury, was invited, with others, to Senator Hanna's dinner to the members of the National Committee in Washington. Several of the Southern members of the committee stayed away because of the negro's presence and others left after he was seated.

RESOLUTIONS calling upon the Government and upon Congress to take immediate steps to stop the disfranchisement of the negro in the Southern States were adopted on the 14th by the Union League Club of New York City, the club which was the first to take up the rights of the negro during the Civil War, and which fitted out at its own expense the first negro regiment to be sent to the front.

THE correct way to pronounce Maeterlinck is "Mahterlink," not Mayerlink or Metterlink, as it is variously called. The French pronounce it Mayerlink, because the sound of ae in French is "a" ; but in Belgian French the ae is pronounced
"ah." Maeterlink is a Belgian, having been born at Ghent in 1864. He has been styled "The Belgian Shakespeare." It was in 1890 that he first became famous, upon the production in Paris of his play
"La Princesse Maleine."

LII.

THE only force in the world which counts in the long run is the moral force which inheres in a consecrated soul on fire with a sublime conviction.

HENRY W. WILBUR.

AT HAND.

THE reign of God ! His light and love and joy,
In glad consent I take His guiding hand,
In the bright sunshine where I live and move,
This quickening impulse is His kind command.

In Him I am. In Him I move and live ;
He lives and moves and loves and is in me :
Direct my thoughts, dear Father, let me give
My heart, my voice, my strength, my all, to Thee.

Yes, when I choose, I hear my Father's voice,
His word my conscience, and His joys my joys !
Among the children of the King I stand ;
My God is here. His kingdom is at hand !

—Edward E. Hale.

ISAAC H. HILLBORN.—A BRIEF SKETCH OF HIS LIFE.

" He liveth long, who liveth well ;
All other life is short and vain :
He liveth longest, who can tell
Of living most for Heavenly gain."

SURROUNDED by the quiet influence of one of the oldest communities of Friends in Pennsylvania, famed in early history as the scene of one of the odd agreements made between Penn and the early inhabitants of the country, the Indians, Isaac Hayhurst Hillborn was born at Wrightstown, Bucks County, on Fifth month 22d, 1835. His early boyhood life was spent here, where he went to school and attended meeting with his parents.

His father and mother, Samuel and Rachael Hayhurst Hillborn, were descendants of primitive Quaker ancestors, who came to this country with William Penn in the ship Welcome. Samuel Hillborn was by trade a tailor, and, besides following his trade, he had the care of the meeting house and grounds. Isaac was the youngest of six children, two brothers and three sisters, three of whom died early in life, before he was old enough to know them, leaving him throughout his life the companionship of but one sister and one brother, who still survive him.

At the age of eleven his parents moved to a farm near Wrightstown, Bucks County, and here were spent some of the happiest years of his life. The children attended school, which, in those days, was held mostly during the winter months, and at other seasons of the year assisted with the work on the farm. They had access to few books, and these were read and re-read by Isaac, who had a natural inclination toward study. Being a deep thinker and of a retentive memory, the information thus gained was of great use to him in mature years, and he often referred to these readings of his boyhood.

As he advanced through life he devoted himself very zealously to study, and at the age of eighteen accepted the position of teacher in the school at Pineville, Bucks County, where he not only successfully met the requirements of the position, but gained the love and respect of his pupils, who often in after years would refer to the time by saying, "I attended thy school." That these references to the early associations were pleasant and encouraging to him to continue the duties of life as he saw them, can be well attested by the fact that frequently, after occasions of such meetings, he would refer to the names, with fond contemplativeness, in the roll book, which remained in his possession until the time of his death.

On Twelfth month 30th, 1858, Isaac was married to Caroline E., daughter of James and Tacy Briggs, of Solebury, Bucks County. They resided on his father's farm at Wrightstown for some years, where Isaac was engaged in farming and teaching school during the winters of 1858 and 1859. After the death of his father in 1863, he came into possession of the farm, and he remained on it until the year 1870. In that year he moved to Newtown, where he engaged in the manufacture of agricultural implements. He was an interested and active worker in the lyceum and literary societies which were held there, and a diligent attender of First-day and midweek meetings. He was appointed by the meeting to the position of elder, which he held for several years.

In 1878, with his family, he moved to Philadelphia, where he engaged in the selling of farm produce in Oxford Street Market, Twentieth and Oxford Streets. His wife Caroline, whose illness increased rather than diminished with time, and who was a constant object of his tender sympathy and love, passed away on the 27th of Twelfth month, 1879, and was buried in Friends' Burial Ground at Newtown on Twelfth month 30th, just twenty-one years from the time of their marriage. Of the six children born to them but two daughters survive him.

In 1880 the position of superintendent of the Farmers' Hay Market, at Seventh and Oxford Streets, was offered to him. This he accepted and retained until the place was sold. In 1889 a new company was formed under the name of the Farmers' New Hay Market Company, and located at Twelfth and Cambria Streets. Isaac was chosen superintendent for the new company, and this position he filled with satisfaction to all until 1902, when he resigned to accept the position of assistant superintendent of the Friends' Book Association, where he remained, when health permitted, until the time of his death.

On Third month 23d, 1881, Isaac H. Hillborn and Anna H., daughter of Sharon and Rebecca Sleeper, were married at 2031 Lambert Street.

His first appearance in public ministry was at the funeral of one of his daughters in 1880, in supplication, and afterward in 1881, in the same manner in the meeting at Seventeenth Street and Girard Avenue. Those of his friends and co-workers in the First-day School and meeting who have been privileged to listen to his ministry can but testify how faithfully he strove to maintain that calm and peaceful manner of the blessed son of God, to whose kingdom he endeavored to direct mankind. As he faithfully followed the teachings of the Master, the beauties of the scriptural truths and injunctions were more clearly opened to his mind, and he was favored to give them expression with consistency and power. None who have heard him can doubt the sincerity of his belief in what the Father gave him to hand forth to the world.

The strongest influence of the minister can be exercised only by a consistent life; this is the secret of the power of the ministry of Isaac H. Hillborn. His gift of qualification for the ministry was recognized by the monthly meeting of Friends held at Fifteenth and Race Streets, in the early part of 1889, when he was named as an approved minister of that meeting. He first attended the yearly meeting of ministers and elders the same year, and it was a very impressive occasion to him.

While greatly favored in the gospel messages which he gave to the assemblies of the people, his travels in those labors were not extended far beyond the limits of his own yearly meeting. He attended many of the quarterly meetings, and frequently the sessions of Bucks Quarterly Meeting, but most frequently those held at Langhorne.

In 1901 he attended the yearly meeting at New York, with a minute from Race Street Monthly Meeting, and in Tenth month of the same year he obtained a similar minute to attend Baltimore Yearly Meeting. In both of these concerns he received the warm sympathy and earnest encouragement of his friends to proceed with the labors which he felt drawn to give in these meetings. That this sympathy and encouragement were strengthening and helpful to him and appreciated by him was fully evident by the manner in which these minutes were returned to the monthly meeting. In 1902 he again attended the meeting of the ministers and elders of New York Yearly Meeting, and also the various sessions of the meetings on First-day, not remaining for the sessions of the business meeting.

In 1882 Isaac first identified himself with First-day School work at Seventeenth Street and Girard Avenue, where his force of character, clearness of explanation and intense devotion drew around him a large and interested company. After a few years of work with a class of the younger children, he took charge of a class of young people about sixteen years of age. So interesting were the sessions of this class that it increased greatly in numbers, and so close were the attachments thus formed that most of them have continued with increasing fondness until the present time. From this stage of labor in the First-day School he was called to the position of superintendent, which he filled with satisfaction for a number of years, when, owing to his calls to the service in the ministry, he resigned the position that he might be free to labor in the larger field. As leader of the conference class at Girard Avenue and Seventeenth Street, after this time he was exceptionally favored many times to light the lamp of understanding for many an inquiring mind, and his enunciation of the "Principles and Testimonies of Friends," now published in booklet, give a clear and concise idea of the beliefs of the Society he loved and served so well.

ISAAC H. HILLBORN.

During a period of many months of suffering and weakness, the intensity of which few but those in closest intimacy with him conceived, and during which time his public service was of as strong a character as when enjoying full health, he ever maintained that patient spirit which marked his life work. All his suffering he bore with Christian fortitude and resignation, giving renewed evidence of a living faith and trust in a loving Father, whose care and love are over all His children who ask for grace sufficient for daily needs. As the end approached this faith and trust grew stronger. He said to those about him, "I am ready. My work is finished. I am waiting the summons. There is nothing in my way." He was permitted to experience a vision of the beyond, for he said, "I can see the loved ones who have gone before; there is room for all, and we shall meet again." What an example is such faith and trust, for the wife, the children and grandchildren who survive him, and for the multitude of friends who have loved him so well!

The end came peacefully and calmly. He closed his eyes, and at 2.30 o'clock on Sixth-day afternoon, Eleventh month 20th, 1903, the immortal part of him whom we knew in this life as Isaac H. Hillborn passed in through the "pearly gates," to remain forever with the Eternal Father. With such an ending to such a life as this, can we not say with the apostle of old: "O grave! where is thy victory? O death! where is thy sting?"

ALBERT H. JOHNSON.

THE DIVINE IN NATURE.—III.

ONE day a dear little girl of three years sat on the floor amidst her play things. In a thoughtful mood she paused in her play, and, looking up to me, she inquired: "Does thee know that our Heavenly Father, and our Heavenly Mother, make everything?" "Yes, dear," I replied, "but who told thee this?" Her artless answer was, "Mamma told me about the Heavenly Father, but the rest I just said myself." By an intuitive sense she had reached a truth which her elders do not always admit. Her mother, at six years of age, unconscious that any one heard her, sang to herself, as she skipped in the joyousness of life, "I think we should be very happy because our Heavenly Father is so good." Both were descendants of one who enriched and ennobled his life by the performance of the common duties of his time, under a sense that, as he often expressed it, "He served a good master," and he saw no reason why he should not be happy in it. A minister among Friends, he bequeathed to his descendants, an unshaken faith in the Divine Goodness.

It seems futile to argue what the soul of a man everywhere attests to be true. The most reliable ethnologists of the present day agree that amongst all nations, even the lowest in the scale of human beings, the basal idea of God, is an inherent one. However low this idea may be, it is always beyond what has been actually attained, and thus is powerful to lead onward and upward. As the nations develop, their ideas are refined and purified, so that in successive ages, the qualities worshiped are continually rising. When strength of arms was most desirable men imagined a God of Power, and used only the masculine appellation. With my dear little girl, the religious world may, in time, recognize the dual nature of the Supreme Mind, and admit the feminine element, as well as the masculine. When it shall do so, a great step forward will have been taken, and the entire world will be benefited thereby. Humanity needs to incorporate into its theology the maternal as well as the paternal; and the nations of mankind require the balance of both the fatherly, and the motherly, before the will of the Uncreated can be done on earth as it is in Heaven. The poet sings of

"The Father God and Mother
Whose intermingled being is The life of every other,"

and we find the distinctions of sex throughout almost the whole system of life, whether plant or animal. Those nations rise the highest in which woman is most exalted, and, like her brother, free to exercise her own sense of right. Those religious denominations approach the nearest to perfection which accord to their members the greatest liberty of thought and action. Those families are the best governed where there is mutual respect for individual sense of duty, and which recognize obedience to God, as above all other claims to authority. Perfect freedom is essential to perfect love. Willing obedience to right is the natural requirement of the human soul. The plant turns to the light, the vine seeks a support, the root searches till it finds water, and just as naturally the soul of the human being opens to the influx of Divinity, because its growth requires it. Throughout history the long struggle of mankind in its upward course has been between some new and higher ideal, often revealed to an individual mind, and an old, accepted authority which has become a fetter. Most pitiful has been the record, and humiliating to the lover of his kind, has been the story of the outrages committed by bigotry on the Seers of the world throughout the ages. In the end, often through torture, bloodshed or the flames, right has been triumphant, and has led the race forward to its present standpoint. That the struggle will continue is evident from the past. We know not yet the bounds of expansion for the human mind, but we do know that it cannot stop here. That the race is ever struggling onward towards an unattained ideal, proves the existence of the Divine Source towards which it is moving, and gives us the reasonable hope of good to come, which shall compensate for all that has been so painful in our past history.

The forces of nature are the expression of an intelligent purpose working for beneficent ends. The earth may be spanned from east to west by electricity, but it needs an intelligent operator to send a message by its aid. Electricity has no purpose of beneficence. It will kill as instantaneously as it will carry words of blessing. Heat is needful to quicken life, but fire will burn as well as warm. Motion exists in all life, but uncontrolled motion is an agency of destruction. In nature we find ordered forces working through unnumbered millions of ages to produce the best results, guarding every object, whether animate or inanimate—not an atom but has its place; not a grain of sand that goes to waste; not a mineral but has its use in creation; not a plant but has its meaning; not an animal that could be spared out of the general system. However deeply science may probe, no portion of matter, of the most inconceivable minuteness, which is not impressed with Divine Energy, which is not controlled by Divine laws; so many atoms of hydrogen,

HARRIET E. KIRK.

HARRIET E. (STOCKLEY) KIRK was born in Accomac County, Virginia, in Third month, 1818. The ancestors of her father were from England, and were among the earliest settlers of Virginia. Her maternal grandfather, John Boissard, was a Huguenot and fled from France at the time of a religious persecution. Her mother died when she was about four years old, and she, the eldest of four children, was given to the care of her aunt, Harriet I. Moore, wife of William W. Moore, then living at Easton, Maryland. Into this family she received a warm welcome, and was brought up as a younger sister of the children of William W. Moore by a former marriage. A few years were spent in Easton, a few more in Baltimore, and in 1834, the family moved to Philadelphia. Harriet was now about sixteen years of age, and soon after this she became a teacher in one of the public schools for boys. After several promotions she was appointed principal of one of the secondary schools, and continued in this work until 1853, when she accepted an invitation from the Friends of Green Street Monthly Meeting to take charge of the school for boys they were about establishing. This position she was still holding when her aunt, Harriet I. Moore, died in 1855. As her aunt's husband, William W. Moore, was now alone in his house, she felt it her duty to give up her teaching and remain with him. Most faithfully did she administer the affairs of his household, and in his latter years devoted herself to the care of him with all the love and affection of a daughter. She was most emphatically one of his family, and whatever was his interest was her interest. His grandchildren especially will ever remember most gratefully her never-failing kindness to them.

Her parents were Episcopalians, but in her aunt's family her associates were very much among Friends, and having become interested in their testimonies and convinced of their principles, she was received into membership by Spruce Street Meeting. This was when she was about thirty years of age, and before the death of her aunt.

William W. Moore died in Fourth month, 1861, just at the beginning of the Civil War. His home was broken up, and Harriet was alone in the world—her father, her sisters and her brother having all passed away before this time. At the invitation of Benjamin P. Moore (a brother of William W.) she spent nearly a year at his home in Fallston, Maryland, and then feeling that her place was in Philadelphia, she returned there and was for some time with her friend, Jane Johnson, whom she accompanied on a visit to friends in Canada and New York, and of whom she writes: "Her self-denying and saintly life was an example to all who were favored to come within her influence." After this she went to live at the home of Dillwyn and Susan M. Parrish, and of these Friends she has left many expressions of love and appreciation. Her life was very active during this period. She again became a teacher, this time in the Girls' Department of Friends' School, at Fifteenth and Race Streets, and she held the position until her health became unequal to the service in connection with many other duties that were pressing upon her. She was deeply interested in the First-day schools, and in other affairs connected with her meeting, and was a most active and energetic member of various committees. Her sympathies were ever with the afflicted and the needy, and no measure of a philanthropic nature but found a ready response from her. She was one of the editors of FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER, and did her full measure of work to make good and improve the standard of the paper. She was greatly interested in the founding of Swarthmore College, and was associated with Edward Parrish and others in holding conferences for the collecting of funds, and in otherwise aiding the good work. Her religious nature was now rapidly developing, and her desire to have her life conform to her high ideals of right became stronger and stronger each day. In First month, 1871 (her gift in the ministry having been acknowledged), after having attended for the first time the Preparative Meeting of Ministers and Elders she writes: "Fervently do I desire that on these occasions, as well as at other times, I may be concerned to abide under the shadow of the Almighty."

Soon after this time she began to visit meetings quite generally, and having felt her "mind drawn to attend all the meetings of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting; to visit the sick and afflicted in some neighborhoods, and those in isolated situations," she began this service early in 1873. When she returned her minutes to the monthly meeting in Ninth month of this year she had attended one hundred and three meetings, and had visited three hundred and nine of the sick, aged and isolated within their limits.

In the spring of the following year (1874) she was married to Charles Kirk, of Warminster, Pa., and her surroundings in his country home were very different from those she had ever known before. She, however, readily adapted herself to the new circumstances of her life, and took up with her wonted zeal and energy the duties that she felt required of her. The tastes and interests of her husband and herself were most congenial, and their life together was a truly happy one. They traveled much in the interests of their beloved Society, attending the yearly meetings of Ohio, Genesee, Indiana and Illinois, and visiting small meetings in Iowa and in other distant places. They were for thirteen years members of the Educational Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, and for two years members of the Visiting Committee of the same. In the discharge of the duties of these and of other committees they were most faithful, time and time again going out in the most inclement weather to keep their appointments. Few enjoyed more than they the social mingling with their friends, and a cordial welcome was ever extended to these in their hospitable home.

Charles Kirk died in the spring of 1890, and for some months Harriet continued to live in their old home. In the autumn of 1892, however, it seemed best that she should return to Philadelphia. About a year after this time she met with a severe accident by being thrown down in the street by a large dog. Although she was seventy-five years of age she underwent, without anaesthetics, the operation of having the broken bones set, thus showing that self-reliance and determination always so characteristic of her. Her recovery from the effects of the accident was more complete than her friends expected it would be, and not until ten years after it was her long and active life closed. She passed away in Tenth month, 1903, at the advanced age of eighty-five years, having been ministered to most affectionately during the long period of her last illness by members of the family of her beloved husband.

Among the many strong points of her character none was more remarkable than the cheerfulness of her religion, "which," as one who knew her for many years has written since her death, "was so practical and unostentatious, so simple and full of love and sympathy that she drew hearts involuntarily to her in a natural way that made her influence for good strongly felt, and that made her a power in this way among the young people, with whom she was a great favorite. Her social nature was especially warm and sincere and open, and she gave to her friends freely the best that was in the rich storehouse of her mind."

CHRISTIAN HISTORY LESSON.—No. 1.

THE POST-APOSTOLIC AGE.

GOLDEN TEXT.—If there is nothing more valuable than the divinity implanted within you—if all things are trifles compared with this—give way to nothing else.

—Marcus Aurelius, Thoughts.

Read as Introduction to Lesson Romans, xiii., 1-14.

WE may regard the Apostolic Age as closing at any particular place in Christendom, when that place ceased to have relations with any of the apostles. In Rome, for instance, it may be said to close with the death of Paul, or of Peter, if we accept the tradition of the visit of the latter to Rome; perhaps, indeed, it would be more accurate to say that Rome had no Apostolic Age, since its church was not founded by an apostle, and does not seem to have been at any time subject to apostolic authority. In the East, as about Ephesus, we have the long-continued presence of apostles, John being recognized as leader of the Ephesian churches until his death in the early part of the second century. In our study of the post-apostolic period, we may say, rather vaguely, that it begins near the end of the first century. The end of this period is more clearly marked. A great change came upon Christianity when it was officially recognized by the Emperor Constantine. It passed at once from at least theoretical outlawry to the rank of a state religion. Instead of a persecuted sect which could be joined only at the expense of danger and loss, it became a popular and prosperous institution. The Christian evangelism, instead of being private, often even secret, could now follow the Roman legions.

We take, then, as our first period in the study of Christianity, the time extending from the end of the first to the early part of the fourth century.

After the unspeakably evil reigns of the Augustan emperors, culminating in the rule of Nero, there came a period of comparative peace and security for the empire. Vespasian (69-79) and Titus, "the well-beloved" (79-81), by their ability and honesty, appropriately introduced the reigns of the so-called "five good emperors"—Nerva, Trajan, Hadrian, Antoninus Pius and Marcus Aurelius (96-180 A.D.). Nerva

"found means to reconcile . . . civil liberty and the power of a prince" (Tacitus); Trajan enlarged the empire by conquests to the north and east. Hadrian, after much study and travel, introduced such changes that the empire ceased to be governed for the benefit of its capital; so that at last "the empire was administered for the good of every race and community within its wide extent" (Wolfson Anct. Hist.). Antoninus Pius "secured the love and happiness of those he ruled"; and Marcus Aurelius, although his reign saw the beginnings of great troubles and difficulties, faced his position and its responsibilities in a spirit of noble manliness. The century from the accession of Vespasian to the death of Marcus Aurelius, is a century of the greatest prosperity in all antiquity. "Some writers have not hesitated to call the second century the happiest period in the history of the human race." (Emerton.)

The danger which, near the end of the second century, began to menace the empire, lay in the increasing strength and daring of the "barbarians," or peoples to the north in the countries of the Rhine and Danube. Marcus Aurelius—by nature and inclination a philosopher—was forced to spend a large part of his active life in desperate warfare on the Danube. In the century following the empire moved rapidly to its fall. A succession of emperors of the worst possible character, such as Commodus and Caracalla, and disputed successions in which several emperors, at once, each elected and supported by a section of the army, struggled for the imperial throne—these disorders reduced the Roman world to confusion and anarchy. Add to this the increasing pressure of the barbarian tribes—the Alemanni, the Goths and the Persians—together with the gradual weakening of the army, and we have conditions which seemed to presage the immediate destruction of the imperial fabric. The fall was checked, however, by the appearance of a series of emperors who were real statesmen as well as able soldiers. Aurelian (270-275) restored the boundaries broken in by the barbarian invasions, and a little later Diocletian (284-305) divided the empire into west and east, with separate emperors, and with provision for the succession. He introduced, also, very strict organization into the civil government and surrounded himself with an oriental court. The empire became in form what it had long been in fact, a despotism. This brings us to the reign of Constantine, which introduces a new period in the history of Christianity.

It was into the interstices of this empire of the second and third centuries that Christianity had spread in the Apostolic Age and in that which followed it. It had in the early part of the time no standing and no external advantages. It made its way wholly by its appeal to the best of human nature at a time when the worst was largely in control.

The wealthy and powerful classes of Rome, and of the provinces, were vicious and wicked beyond expression. But the great mass of people felt the power of Christian ideals when other ideals were low or insufficient, and they were drawn to Christianity in great numbers.

THE YORK CONFERENCE ON THE MINISTRY.

In last week's issue reference was made to the conference on the ministry ordered by London Yearly Meeting to be held in the autumn. The conference met at York from the 23d to the 25th of Eleventh month. The demands on our space make it impossible for us to give this week a full account of the papers and discussion. The main results may be here stated in brief.

The question whether Friends should continue to express approval of the ministry of a member by recording him as a minister was very frankly considered. At the morning session of the last day of the conference the clerk made the following summary of the lines of thought before the meeting: (1) In regard to the recognition of ministers it was clear that in some districts much difference of opinion existed, and that practical difficulties in its carrying out continued. (2) The entire abolition had been advocated by some. (3) Other evidence laid before the conference proved that in the majority of districts no special difficulty existed. (4) The clerk took it to be the sense of the conference that the principle and practice of the recording of the ministry should be continued. (5) If this judgment were accepted, there remained the consideration how to deal with the suggestions of those who, while supporting the practice, favored "slight," "some" or "little" modification.

After further consideration, the following was heartily agreed to: "In the hope of fostering a helpful ministry in our meetings, and giving the sympathy of the Church to Friends who take some part in the vocal ministry, but whose names may not have been recorded as ministers, the conference recommends the Yearly Meeting to empower such monthly meetings as may think it desirable to appoint triennially ministry committees, consisting of such members as are thought suitable, in virtue either of their own service in the vocal ministry of meetings for worship or mission meetings, or of their concern for the right exercise of the ministry (whether otherwise members of the meeting on ministry and oversight or not), all members of these committees to become on such appointment members of the meeting on ministry and oversight [corresponding to our meeting of ministers and elders].

"The Ministry Committee (in addition to any duties devolved upon them by the monthly meeting on ministry and oversight) would meet from time to time for fellowship and conference among themselves, and would find service in arranging conferences on subjects connected with the ministry, to which others, whether members, associates, or attenders, could be invited, as might seem desirable, and also in promoting, by Bible study or otherwise, the preparation of the heart and mind for the ministry."

Another recommendation of the conference was, "that, when building new meeting-houses, and in the rearrangement of existing meeting-houses, the gallery might be less obtrusive, and that all seats should be so placed as to make it easy for Friends to speak from any part of the meeting."

The arrangement of the York meeting-house in which the conference was held well illustrates the seating aimed at in the recommendation. The form is a hollow square, the back seats on every side being raised.

A third recommendation of the conference was "that meetings for worship should not necessarily be broken up by ministers, but by elders or other suitable Friends."

In the discussion that preceded this conference, a part of which was quoted in our last issue, and in the papers and discussion of the conference itself, the concern of Friends was not whether the custom of recording ministers should be discontinued or not; it was much deeper than that. Realizing that the ministry, taking it all through, in all the meetings, is in an unsatisfactory condition, Friends had set themselves to try to get at the cause of the weakness and to do what might be done from the human side toward making our preaching more effective and more general among our concerned membership. Some felt that to bring about a general exercise of the ministry in our meetings it would be necessary to do away with the custom of recording. Others felt the Friendly disinclination to so radical a change, and could not see how a change in mere outward arrangements could have any very profound effect on a matter so purely spiritual.

The conference took no radical action, and yet those in favor of the most radical change must feel a great deal of unity with its conclusion.

The recommendations are in the interest of a more general exercise of the ministry among the members of a meeting, quite as much as could be the abolition of the custom of recording. At the same time they leave the time-honored and beloved custom to stand and perhaps gradually to go into disuse without any wrench to those who are attached to it; or, as many would hope, it may come gradually to be carried out in a way better adapted to the present-day needs, and again come to be the strength and help that it has been in the past.

WHY FRIENDS ISSUE OTHER LESSONS BESIDES THE SERIES ON THE INTERNATIONAL TEXTS.

THE mission of the First-day school is to impart knowledge, to build character, and to help in preparing the pupils to become good citizens and useful members of the Society of Friends. The knowledge imparted should be different from that given in the secular schools, and the Bible should be the basis of the teaching. In imparting a knowledge of the Bible the teacher should select for his class subjects suited to their age and mental development. It would be just as advisable to have all the pupils of a day school, from six to twenty years of age, studying the same topics in geography, history, arithmetic and grammar, as to have all the pupils in a First-day school studying the same passages of Scripture.

The International Lesson Leaves have been used by one or two generations of children, and yet to-day there is an ignorance of the Bible on the part of the young that is appalling to our thoughtful educators. From one point of view it is pleasant to think that each First-day millions of Christian children the world over are studying the same Bible lesson; but when we consider the welfare of the child and realize that not more than one-tenth of these pupils can possibly be giving their time and thought to the lesson best suited to their needs, it is wise to put aside sentiment. Many of the committee who have been working on the International Lessons realize their weakness, and are advocating graded lessons and a more rational method of teaching.

One weakness of the International Leaflets used by other denominations is that they contain the selection from Scripture which forms the lesson for the day, and most of the pupils do not have Bibles in their hands at all; the old custom of giving a Bible to each child of a Christian family as soon as he was old enough to read it has fallen into disuse. Even in Friends' families Bible reading in the home is the exception rather than the rule, and unless the average child uses the Bible itself in the First-day school class, he grows up unfamiliar with its arrangement and its contents. With the Bible in his hands he will often feel a desire, after the lesson is over, to read other chapters that precede or follow.

During his course in the First-day school a child should become familiar with the principal stories in the Old and New Testaments; between the ages of eight and thirteen, when the power of memorizing is strongest, he should commit many passages to memory that will be treasured in mature life. When he is somewhat further advanced he should learn the outlines of Jewish history, the growth of the Christian Church, and the history of the Society of Friends; he should understand the reasons for Friends' testimonies, as set forth in the Discipline; he should study the Bible as literature and receive inspiration from the messages of the prophets; and he should consider his relations to his fellow men and his duties as a citizen.

With a graded series of lessons, beginning with suggestive outlines for teachers of primary grades, and followed by a series of booklets each containing material for a year's work, the pupils of any school, however small, could follow such a course of study. Let us suppose a country school with one adult class and one class of children. The children could begin with the book in the series adapted to their average attainments; after using the material in the book best suited to their needs, they could take the next book in the course the ensuing year and continue until they had used them all. The working out of such a course of study as this would be a help not only to our own but to other religious organizations that are dissatisfied with the International Lessons. The Christian who is of most service to his neighbors is the one who is ever seeking for more light, while he is letting his light shine.

A DETERMINED attack is being made on free seed distribution, by members of Congress; as one paper puts it, "to stop the mischief of Congressional petty pilfering under the guise of free seed distribution—that hoary old fraud which evokes a cynical smile from all Congressmen, and yet flourishes and grows." The originators of the seed distribution thought that new and valuable seed would be sent by members of Congress to those whom they knew to be enthusiastic investigators. Instead, cheap seed of common varieties are spread broadcast for the purpose of giving Congressman a perquisite. Whatever seeds are sent out ought to be sent by the Department of Agriculture and with a view to experimenting with and the introduction of new varieties, and not with the view of enabling Congressmen to furnish free seed for the spring planting to those of their constituents who like to get something for nothing when there is an opportunity.

In his sermon in the Madison Avenue Baptist Church, New York, last First-day, Dr. George C. Lorimer deplored the inadequacy of religious education. "It is a sad fact," he said, "that most of our college men are densely ignorant of Holy Writ, and that there has been a deplorable neglect of religious training for the past twenty-five years is everywhere evident.

BIRTHS.

BROSIOUS.—At Chatham, Pa., on Eleventh month 27th, 1903, to Charles C. and Emma R. Brosius, a daughter, whose name is Margery Cloud Brosius.

CLEMENT.—At Oak Summit, N. Y., Eleventh month 27th, 1903, to Frederick and Martha G. Sutton Clement, a daughter, who is named Fredrika Martha Clement.

DEATHS.

BUSHONG.—On First-day, Twelfth month 20th, 1903, at his home in New York City, Dr. Charles H. Bushong, son of Gilbert and Edith K. Bushong, in the 47th year of his age.

CADWALLADER.—At his home in Titusville, Pa., Twelfth month 11th, 1903, his 65th birthday, Jacob Augustus Cadwallader; a member of Makefield Meeting.

GOVER.—At her residence, 1143 21st street, N. W., Washington, D. C., Twelfth month 17th, 1903, Temperance Matthews Gover, wife of Samuel A. Gover, in the 69th year of her age, after an illness of three weeks.

She was a daughter of the late Amos and Ellen Marsh Matthews, of Baltimore county, Maryland. Although not a member of the Society of Friends, she was always in close touch with us and kindly entertained Friends, and was ever ready and willing to render aid and assistance to the sick and the needy, irrespective of their creed, race or worldly estate.

HAVILAND.—At his home, Purchase, N. Y., Twelfth month 8th, 1903, William F. Haviland, in the 88th year of his age. He was a life-long member and for many years an elder of Purchase Monthly Meeting, interested in the work of the Society and the First-day school. His was an independent, progressive character, and he followed with integrity his ideal of the citizen and the Friend.

"So to address our spirits to the height
And so attune them to the valient whole,
That the great light be clearer for our light
And the great soul be stronger for our soul,
To have done this is to have lived, though fame
Remember us with no familiar name."

HILLBORN.—In Philadelphia, Pa., Eleventh month 20th, 1903, after a lingering illness, Isaac H. Hillborn, in the 69th year of his age; a minister of Philadelphia Monthly Meeting. Interment at Fair Hill, Philadelphia.

KENDERDINE.—At the home of his son, Isaac W., in Germantown, Philadelphia, Twelfth month 14th, 1903, Joseph Rakestraw Kenderdine, in his 91st year.

He was the last of a family of twelve; his family were members of Horsham Meeting. At the time of the separation his father's family joined with our branch, while his mother's family, the Rakestraws, joined the other body of Friends. But this did not interfere with the pleasant relations existing between them; his affection for his uncle, Joseph Rakestraw, for whom he was named, was very strong.

At the age of sixteen he went to Philadelphia and was apprenticed to William Ellis, a carpenter; he worked at this trade until 1840, when, in partnership with Warner Justice, he started the hardware business in which he continued until he retired, some thirty years later, having in the meanwhile removed to Germantown. He was an earnest advocate of, and fearless worker in, the anti-slavery cause. In 1841 he married Sarah C. Wright. They had seven children, four of whom survive them, three sons and one daughter, Laura, who has for some time been a teacher in the Friends' Central School. Notwithstanding his advanced age, he retained his faculties to the last, and enjoyed seeing his friends. He was, at the time of his death, a member of Green Street Monthly Meeting, Philadelphia.

SMITH.—In San Francisco, California, Twelfth month 14th, 1903, Barclay J. Smith. The funeral was held on Fourth-day, 23d, at Wrightstown Friends' Meeting-house, Bucks county, Pa.

Thirty years ago Barclay J. Smith was one of the leading business men of Newtown, Pa. He was for several years superintendent of Newtown First-day School, and was one of the most active members of Bucks First-day School Union. Owing to business reverses he left Bucks county and went West. Through his efforts a Friends' meeting was started in San Francisco, which welcomed Friends of all denominations, but was conducted for years in accordance with the Discipline of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. Active mission work was carried on by the Friends here and much good was done. An effort was made to have this meeting taken under the care of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, but it was not successful; and just at the time that the Joint Committee for Isolated Members was organized, the San Francisco meeting became connected with California Yearly Meeting of the other branch of Friends. Barclay continued to attend the meeting and to take an interest in it, but it remained a cause of regret with him that our Society had not sooner made provision for the encouragement of Friendly organizations among isolated members.

WALTON.—At the home of her brother, Caleb J. Moore, 2110 Mt. Royal Terrace, Baltimore, Md., Twelfth month 6th, 1903, of pneumonia, after a brief illness, Elizabeth H., widow of the late Samuel B. Walton, in her 78th year.

She was the only remaining daughter of the late Benjamin P. and Mary H. Moore, and is survived by six children: Ella W. Matlack, of Portland, Oregon; William E. Walton, Pocomoke City, Md.; Virginia W. Topfiff, Arkansas City, Kansas; Maurice Walton, Portland, Oregon; Lucy W. Hawk, Purcell, Indian Territory, and Howard Walton, Newberg, Oregon. Her bright and happy disposition endeared all to her with whom she came in contact, and she put in daily practice the aim and prayer of a well-spent life to administer to the necessities of those less fortunate than herself, and try and make the world better for having lived in it. Having been fond of travel and visiting around among her scattered children, she made a wide circle of friends, and memorial services were held in several places to her memory. Interment took place at the Little Falls Friends' burying-ground, Fallston, Maryland, where two of her children and a large number of former friends and relatives are buried.

COMMUNICATIONS.

[Two communications on the subject of the Lesson Leaves were received too late for publication in this issue; they will appear next week.]

THE LESSON LEAVES.

I am glad to see the matter of the form of Lesson Leaves for First-day Schools is receiving some further discussion, and will be glad to add a word as to the manner in which I view the matter.

There seem to be two questions, Shall we have lessons dated for each consecutive week in the year? and, Shall we follow the course of the International Series?

As to the first, the usual benefits of uniformity are apparent. But I am inclined to believe that of greater importance is the fact that such a plan tends to encourage regular study throughout the year. Its tendency seems to me to be to discourage the habit of suspending the holding of First-day Schools, and where this may be absolutely necessary, individuals are encouraged to continue the work on their own account, or to intelligently join with others when occasion offers. And this is perhaps the most important reason of all, for to such persons will a study of the Bible become most important and helpful.

As to the other question, The International Series is certainly prepared on a systematic plan. Perhaps a better plan might be devised, perhaps it might be on lines more favorable to the peculiar views of a majority of Friends. But if anything is to be avoided, it is a selection of such parts of the Bible as suit our views, and entirely neglecting the rest. And if this Series is selected as particularly favoring the views of certain sects of the Church, will it not be particularly beneficial if these selections should be explained in the light which we profess to have.

But I am firmly convinced that from a historical and literary standpoint the Bible is the greatest of books, and if studied in this light, and if it will show us the "truth" and the "light" as was the testimony of early friends, and later ones, that it does, these things will of their own power become apparent. What we need is more knowledge; what we want is more light, not light of a peculiar hue.

And even if true that there are topics not altogether suitable for teaching of children; other matter can be added as necessary. No course probably could be devised which would be equally suitable for both children and adults. Perhaps we might follow the practice of some denominations who have the same lessons treated for children, for intermediates, and for adults.

But above all things let us not put ourselves in the attitude of teaching "Quakerism." As I read our early history, it seems that our organization largely grew upon a protest against the "teaching of doctrines," and let us candidly admit that from fear that we might be guilty of "proselyting," we have in some degree neglected religious training, even amongst our young people.

It is admitted that the call to "mind the light," is being more and more heard by all who call themselves Christian. And may I be pardoned for suggesting that there may be occasion that we give a new testimony; that this is more important than doctrinal difference of opinion. And will it not be healthful for us, in this small degree, to show a readiness to join ourselves with other Christian peoples?

VISITS OF FRIENDS TO BLUE RIVER.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

I FEEL it due to the memory of the dear Friends from the East who have visited us in the past, and due the appreciation in which we received their labors of love, to correct a little mistake in the report of Joel Borton, in the INTELLIGENCER of Eleventh month 14th. He was informed whilst at this place (Blue River) "that but one other ministering Friend from the East had ever visited us." I think I see how this mistake occurred. We have quite a goodly number of young Friends, and some older who are young in Society affairs, who doubtless can remember but one visit from the East previous to his, for of late years we seem to have been rather forsaken in that line. But I wish to mention a few whose visits were to us who are older as refreshing fountains by the wayside to the weary traveler, each giving evidence in their different gifts of having their lips touched with "a live coal from off the holy altar." I will mention the names of those I can remember, though I have not the dates of their visits by me. I will begin with Rachel Hicks, who paid us two visits; Nicholas and Margaret Brown from Canada, Ann Weaver, Benjamin Hollowell, Lydia H. Price, Isaac Hicks, Sarah Price, Lydia Garrett, Eliza Chandler, Sarah Hunt, Elizabeth Thistlewaite (I think her visit was after she moved East) and Edward H. Magill.

I will state one circumstance connected with Rachel Hicks's first visit here. She was in her own conveyance, and making rather a flying trip, had visited Blue River settlement and was about to leave, but the team ran away, in Salem, I think, and she had to wait for repairs. During that time she came to our neighborhood (known now as Highland Creek) and had an appointed meeting at our house, the first, and I may say the start, of what has turned out to be a prosperous community, six miles west of Old Blue Meeting (since gone down). It was thought that our folks had moved almost beyond the borders of civilization. In the course of her communication she was led to speak on the subject of using the "switch," or something to that effect, in correcting children. Our folks, in the honesty of their hearts, rather believed in Solomon's doctrine, "Spare the rod and spoil the child." My mother was a deeply pious and religious woman, and her whole course of treatment in raising a large family was changed from that time.

There is not one of the visits but had some pleasant memory connected with it. Joel's visit here was highly appreciated by old and young, but it was too short. If he could have stayed over First-day it would have given a chance for some of our members to have gotten out who are engaged during the week.

THE PLAIN LANGUAGE.

In reading extracts from letters of isolated Friends I have been much gratified to see that they still have such an interest in our Religious Society and I desire they may continue that interest and be encouraged in every good word and work, though away from the associations of Friends and mingling at times with other denominations. May they have the Holy Spirit and enjoy the love of God shed abroad in their hearts.

I notice one speaks of using the plain language. The practice would be an advantage to all Friends, whether they be located in the neighborhood of Friends, or be isolated. Some may think it a small matter, and feel it a cross to use it, still may we encourage one another to be faithful, bearing in mind the Scriptural expressions, "He that is faithful in the little shall be made ruler over more"; and, "He that taketh up the Cross shall receive the Crown."

May each one of us be willing to be obedient to the smallest requisition, even in the use of the plain language, as it may be a benefit to us religiously and no disadvantage secularly.

ANECDOTE OF JOHN JACKSON.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

In addition to the interesting reminiscences published in the life of John Jackson, I will mention a little incident that occurred whilst I was one of the members of his family. On a very stormy Sabbath morning, when the rain and sleet made it almost impossible to turn out, a man humble in appearance and seeming no stranger to the ills of life, called at Sharon and inquired for the minister. When Uncle John appeared he said he had recently moved with his family near Darby, that one of his children had died the day before, and he wished our preceptor to come and preach the funeral sermon, expecting to pay him for the service. Uncle John tried to explain to him that he never made appointments to preach, nor received money as a recompense for so doing, but promised to attend the funeral. In the afternoon he took his umbrella and walked amid the storm to the place designated; and we were afterwards told that he preached a powerful sermon.

NOTES.

Through an oversight the item from the Philadelphia Ledger referring to our Friend Alfred Moore as a member of the other body of Friends, was quoted in this column last week without correction. Alfred Moore is well known to all Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, having been for many years Clerk of the Representative Committee, and also one of the Clerks of the Yearly Meeting. He is a member of the Monthly Meeting held at Race street, and always active in its interests.

As a result of the correspondence carried on for two or three years by the Joint Committee for work among Isolated Friends, the Friends in a few cities have been made aware of one another's existence and the following persons have volunteered to act as correspondents.

Traveling Friends who desire to hold meetings in these cities, or pay personal visits can make arrangements by writing to them. Detroit, Emille P. Jackson, 113 Canfield Ave.; Cleveland, A. Eastburn and Ellen Kenderdine Reeder, of Solebury, entertained about fifty of their relatives and friends on Twelfth month 15th, at twelve o'clock, in being the fifth anniversary of their marriage. The original marriage certificate was shown, and of the forty-two signatures it contains ten are still living, of whom the following were present: Thaddeus S. Kenderdine, Elizabeth M. Fell, Edward Taylor, Sarah J. Reeder, Ruth S. Quinby, Robert Eastburn, and Ellen E. Hart. Other marriage certificates of the ancestors of the host and hostess were shown, as far back as 1703, the family and its descendants having lived at Flatbush Run since 1777.

A paper of interesting reminiscences was presented by T. S. Kenderdine, which was read by Hugh E. Eastburn. [Doylstown Intelligencer.]

THE DIVINE IN NATURE.—III.

so many of oxygen to form water; so many of nitrogen and so many of oxygen to form the air we breathe; so many of a quadruple compound to form protoplasm, out of which all cells are builded.

If any one wishes to be convinced of the beneficent aim exhibited in the progress from the cell to man, let the study of Palaeontology be included in his education. Let him at least outline in his mind the great periods. First, that in which no life is recognized; second, that in which only protoplasm is known; third, that in which the animal forms are all without a back bone; fourth, that in which the vertebrates appear; fifth, that in which animals with warm blood are known; and later, step by step, one advance after another being made, until finally a being is reached on whom has been bestowed the divine capacity of thought, with the consciousness of an immortal mind, with an inherent sense of his descent from an eternal source, and with ideas of right and wrong and of duty and responsibility. Until man is reached the whole animal kingdom furnishes no evidence of a being possessed of a self-conscious soul, seeking communion with a spiritual nature above its own, and desirous of offering obedience to the spiritual laws which it is enabled to comprehend. This is true worship, and is the foundation of all genuine religion. The individual, the nation, or the race, which is most obedient to the divine ideal progresses the most securely; but whether we are true or false, success continues according to the plan and purpose of the ages. If we are false, another who is true, will arise. If our nation leaves the path of ascent, another will take its place. If our race should fall, some other will move forward. A purpose which has held its sway since time began cannot be turned aside by man. We may lose, we may never; neither shall the earth cease to wear its crown of glory.

It is useless to dogmatize on spiritual matters, but, personally, I have no belief in the Oriental doctrine of Reincarnation. It does not seem to me to be consistent with the apparent plan on which the development of the system of life has proceeded. So far as we know, each plant and animal has been derived from that which preceded it, under the general plan of improvement. But back of the seen was always the Unseen, transforming the material, according to the laws of the immaterial. Under the same laws, I believe our souls are born of our parents, showing their mental and spiritual characteristics as clearly as their bodily features. Having no existence, except potentially, before its mysterious birth, when once launched into existence, I believe it to be as immortal as thought and spirit. I believe it moulds the body in accordance with its own laws, and is fed, strengthened and nurtured by spiritual potencies, as the body is fed by food of a material nature. Thus we are all dependent upon Him the endless, unbegun,

The Unnamable, the One,
Light of all our light, the Source
Of life, and Force of force."

I may close with what was written and printed nearly thirty years ago, but which is as true to me now as it was when first penned.

"In man THOUGHT FORCE gained its true terrestrial exponent, and the soul beamed from its temperament to work all the wonders it has wrought. Nothing paramount to this occurred earlier; not even the change from inanimate to animate matter was a rise so grand, so fruitful in results as this.

"But, as the forces and tendencies of intellectual life lie sleeping in the ovule from which is developed the individual man, so in the germ of being, residing in atoms, may sleep the forces and tendencies of immeasurable spiritual power. The erect, large-brained thinker was ordained when atoms ranged themselves by their axes of rotation. This intelligent being is a necessity of the eternal activities of nature, which, working under the Divine Ordainer, must produce good, better, best. Atomic Force, Molecular Force, Growth Force, Nerve Force, Thought Force, Spiritual Power—these succeed each other because the universe is living and not dead; because the Supreme Soul vivifies eternally with light and life and love—with all the attributes of mind.

"Considering life as one of the cosmical forces, resulting from the interaction of spirit and matter, coeval with God, and eternal in its duration, its sphere of activity must be boundless as infinitude; and wherever all the forces of nature act together in due harmony there must life be exhibited in one phase or another of its development.

"To what height it may arise above anything known upon earth it is impossible for the human mind to conjecture. Our individual duty is to rise as near the Source as is possible to each, and thus aid in elevating our own race.

"That one single sphere should be selected as a theatre for the display of the vital forces is incompatible with the play of the whole class of motions whose proper field of action is the universe. The improba-bility of the partial action of general laws is so strong as to bear the stamp of impossibility; and we are warranted in believing that we are connected by ties of relationship, not only with every terrestrial being, but also with those existing on every life center in the expanse beyond; and that the purpose of creation is to multiply beings attuned to the Divine Nature destined to an immortal existence in the midst of the everlasting harmonies." THE ROSE VALLEY SHOPS AND SETTLEMENT.

The "Artsman" is a periodical issued by the Rose Valley Association, an arts and crafts settlement in Delaware County, Pa., in which our friend, William Price, is interested. The first number, Tenth month, 1903, answers the question as to what and where Rose Valley is and what it is for. The following, taken from an article by the editors, William Price, Horace Trauble and Hawley McLanahan, will give some idea of the attitude and plans of the settlement.¹

"Through creative thought and work alone does development come."

"We believe, in the first place, that it is reasonable and possible for people who are interested in the same or similar pursuits to band themselves together to mutually secure elbow room where they may at least enjoy certain advantages of association and fellowship that are denied them in the prevalent social order."

"Strong in the faith, men, women and children to the number of sixty or more, have made their homes at Rose Valley. Here they have established a furniture shop in which no work is done that will not bear the most severe scrutiny as to honesty and thoroughness of construction. . . . Here a metal working shop is being set up. Here the weaver, the potter, the printer, and whatever other craftsman you will, may have his shop. . . . Here the tiniest cottage may be built side by side with a more spacious neighbor."

"Rose Valley is not an impractical or visionary undertaking, but a concrete business proposition. The Rose Valley Association was chartered in Seventh month, 1901. . . . Rose Valley unites with various other societies throughout the world in a general protest against the often vulgar product of the modern machine and against the consequent degradation and ruin of the craftsman. . . . Rose Valley is to do what it can to break down the artificial distinction made in modern society between the work of the hand and the work of the brain. Rose Valley is convinced that manual labor must be restored to its rightful place of priority and honor. The Rose Valley Association as an association does not manufacture. It extends an invitation and offers an opportunity to accredited craftsmen to work in its shops under the patronage of its emblem."

"Those who are to make beautiful things must live in a beautiful place," said William Morris. It was such a conviction which led to the selection of Rose Valley (an old name) as a favorable location for the shops. The site taken up comprises about eighty acres of land, once largely occupied with spacious stone mills and picturesque tenant houses. This piece of land lies in the valley of Ridley Creek, near the station, known as Moylan, situated about thirteen miles southwest of Philadelphia. None of the local wreckage of this more remote era of manufacturing is to be thrown away. The mill walls still standing are to be utilized in the development of the shops. The old stone residences have been remodeled into habitable homes, supplied with necessary modern appointments, and each house has its own small garden."

"The great distances between the scattered homes of the city workmen make the mutual life which comes easily at Rose Valley impossible. Every settler at Rose Valley has an immediate co-operative interest in the communal life."

"We do not so much propose to arraign the present regime as by practical demonstration to prove that other conditions may be prophesied."

"To Rose Valley labor may be worship. Labor is not a worship that disposes of other worshippers. . . . The Rose Valley shops are temples. Here men pray in their work. Here men practice fellowship in their work."

"Rose Valley does not say the machine does nothing. It admits the machine. Rose Valley will try to do some of the things that the machine cannot do. It will even co-operate with the machine. But it will only co-operate as the master of the machine. It will not admit the supremacy of the machine. Rose Valley is not barking and snarling up the alleys of trade. It thinks that taking industry as it was and is the machine was and is inevitable. But Rose Valley goes a little further. It says: I, too, am inevitable."

"The machine-made man is against the race. The man-made machine is for the race."

In the second number of the "Artsman," that for Eleventh month, besides articles by the editors there is one by Peter Burrowes. There are also some paragraphs pro and con from letters to the "Artsman." We quote from these:

"I have never lost my interest in, or enthusiasm for, such attempts, and if they end only in attempts, it is good all the same, and helps on the cause of humanity."

"If I were longer capable of feeling an inspiration, surely this would bring it. I know of no previous communal promise that ever inspired me as does this of Rose Valley, . . . the valley dwellers whose pitched aim gives them their own hilltops of outlook and easier hitching of our machinery to the stars."

"I am not so sure about Rose Valley. I concede your good motive. But men are not to be moved isolatedly; they are to be moved in masses; with here and there a prophet voice, perhaps; but the prophet voice itself is of little use until it is lost in the hurrah of the crowd. What is Rose Valley doing for the crowd?"

"... Your idealized communities never come to anything. A craft community is one thing. A community of economic dreamers is another thing. Yes, quite another thing. I do not know whether Rose Valley will be able to keep the two things apart. What I do know is that if it does not the misstep will be fatal."

"I am confident that such a community as Rose Valley seems to be is the type of the coming industrial civilization. There is no other solution possible of the industrial problem, given human nature as it is and civilization as it is forming."

"I do not think 'The Artsman' will succeed in drawing a sharp line and saying, 'This side is Rose Valley, this side is the craft, and over there is the economic world.'"

"I hope that Rose Valley does not propose to attempt any wholesale onslaught on machinery. You should remember what the machine has done for civilization; indeed, the machine has made civilization. . . . So I hope you will not be too sure that Rose Valley is to contribute anything essential to the progressive forces of the race. We will go on. But we will not go on without the machine."

"I should wish to see 'The Artsman' going out to the world with a universal message. Let that message commence at Rose Valley, but do not let it finish there."

"The Artsman" is illustrated with drawings by Will Price, of views in and about the settlement, and of Rose Valley furniture.

TRAINING CHILDREN FOR PEACE.

I CALLED attention a month or two ago to the noble circular of the French Women's Society for Peace and Disarmament, and to the fact that it had received the sanction of the government of the Republic. That it is no isolated act, appears from a recent circular issued by the Superintendent of Public Instruction at Paris. "I request," he says, "the teachers to see to the removal from the walls of the schools of all pictures representing scenes of violence. . . . We should be careful not to familiarize children with sights of violence and ferocity. The brutal instincts of the human race are not yet sufficiently weakened or crowded out by higher ones to admit of our placing before the eyes of the young scenes of murder and other atrocities. Our moral law is based on the intangible law of absolute respect for human life. . . . We should teach children that unjust war is a horrible inheritance of ancestral brutality, and that a nation which takes up arms without having first tried every means of conciliation, without having made strenuous efforts to settle differences by arbitration, commits an abuse of force. That nation dishonors itself. It places itself beyond the pale of reason and humanity and its conduct is bestial."—[The Whim.]

THE collection made in the Catholic Churches for the Catholic University in Washington amounted in Baltimore to $6,000. Cardinal Gibbons, who is Chancellor of the University, thinks from reports received that the total sum collected in the United States will amount to $100,000.

AUTOGRAPH LETTERS OF WILLIAM PENN.

PROMINENT among the lot sold at the Proud Sale in Philadelphia recently was an unusual collection of autograph letters of William Penn. In mere number it was a strong collection, there being twenty-seven gathered together, but a more interesting feature was the fact that nearly half of them are unpublished, and many others have only been used in part in Robert Proud's "History of Pennsylvania," which he published early in the last century.

As some of the unpublished letters are of interest, they are given below:

In a letter to Thomas Lloyd, and dated Warminghurst, seventh of Eighth month, 1684, Penn says:

"The Lord hath brought us all safe to land after six weeks & 4 days passage, of wch time we lay beating on ye northwest side of ye Irish coast about 18 days by cross winds. I found my dear wife & family well to my rejoicing. I landed within 7 miles of my own home, but coming to search and sett to rights my papers, To my astonishment I find not one of ye York ones, no affidavit before ye Mayor about seating Delaware River and Bay, the ground of my coming & Strength of all my cause, the Council fixing the point there. The Duke has putt it off "till December," & if I can gett it off till "March," twill be all I can do, wherefor instantly away to York, & gett affidavits of the 3 yt N. Byare says can speak to yt matter both before the Mayor & ye Gouvernour renders the seal of town & Province, the Gouvernour to be sure: for yt will be most outlandish, all depends on this, & if John White or Saml Laud can see it done, & swear the hand of Governour & Mayor, it will be the stronger. Philip Lemain can never while he lives repaire me this wrong, by his supine neglect, so often did I speak to thee where are ye York papers, & to him, be sure I have ye York Papers yt T. Lloyd has put up & he said they were and not a scrap of them to be seen, this is a truble beyond measure to me & an injury to the whole. I have no news to send for I know little. East brought Sidneys & other tryalls, more expect when I see the K. & Q. & my friends at Court. Salute me to ye Gov'r of York, G. Lowry, his writt a most wicked ——— about West Jersey business against me, what shall I say of such men. I leave them to the just Judge & pray they may repent. Salute me dearly to Fds in ye town, particularly to J. Sim, C. Taylor, J. Har, W. Wood, T. Holmes."

In another letter, under date of Charing Cross, seventeenth, First month, 1684-5, which is addressed to Thomas Lloyd, President, and the Provincial Council, he gives the news of the death of his friend, King Charles II., and of the accession of James II. as king. He bids the Council to see that they forthwith proclaim the new king, over the Province and Territories, at Philadelphia and New Castle. Continuing, he wrote:

"Whether you only order the publication of this and so make it yours by yt orders, or publish a new one including this, I do order the doeing of it, forthwith—My meanings is yt within one hour after ye receipt hereof, or as soon as possible you can, he be proclaimed & that you keep an account of ye time of doeing it from ye time of its arriving your hands; that when you transmitt yt account of ye care therein it may appear you were not remiss therein, especially at Philadelphia. Pray be carefull in ye places, that all due reverence be yeilded on all occasions to the King, & his Authority, who is Sovereign, for by our dutiffulness we are safe."—[The Friend, Philadelphia.]

EDUCATIONAL. GEORGE SCHOOL.

SIXTH-DAY evening, Twelfth month 11th, George School's first debate as a member of the Interscholastic Debating League took place with Germantown Academy. The question, "Resolved, That the political parties of Pennsylvania should nominate the candidates for elective offices by a direct vote of the people," was debated on the affirmative side by Germantown's representatives, Sedgwick Townsend, Sheldon Potter and Howard Sandt, and on the negative by George Eves, Lanning Masters and Edwin Maule. The judges, Karl Kelsey, of the University of Pennsylvania, Peter Hay, of Haverford, and Henry Smith, of Germantown, decided in favor of the affirmative.

Seventh-day evening, Twelfth month 12th, the opening lecture of the lecture course was given by Leland Powers. The subject of his famous impersonation was "Borrowed Spectacles."

Fourth-day afternoon, Twelfth month 16th, Dr. Benjamin F. Battin, of Swarthmore College, gave an exceedingly interesting illustrated lecture on the "Passion Play," in the George School Assembly Room. The lecture was given under the auspices of the Newtown New Century Club, and was greatly appreciated by the Faculty and students of the school, as well as by the members of the Club.

A declamatory contest between the two literary societies, the Penn and Whittier, took place Seventh-day evening, Twelfth month 19th. The Penn Society was represented by Emma Wilson. "Fair Play for Women," Jeanette Jackson; "The Storming of the Castle," from "Ivanhoe," Arthur Henrie; "Toussaint L'Ouverture." Those representing the Whittier were: Harry Sherwood, "Valley Forge"; Alice Hicks, "Editha's Burglar"; Florence Stackhouse, "The Catnip Garden." The judges, William Wynkoop, of Newtown, J. H. Hoffman, Principal of Newtown High School, and Dr. Joseph S. Walton, decided in favor of the Penn Society. F. B. S.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE.

Dr. Magill gave the lecture this week. His subject was "Some Facts about the Early History of Swarthmore." A number of students and others were present. The "Garden" was sung and Dr. Magill cheered with the college yell. His lecture was very interesting. It traced the college from the first proposal to its actual reality, showing the different advancements Swarthmore has made. Throughout the talk there was an irresistible humor which kept the audience in good spirits. Some of the distinguished teachers and benefactors were eulogized.

Dr. Holmes entertained with a dinner at his home, those who take their principal subject with him. There were toasts given and a general good time enjoyed. Dr. Holmes' course in History of Philosophy and Religion is becoming more and more popular. His opportunities for traveling through the Orient and Holy Land enable him to make the subject very interesting.

The Somerville Literary Society held its regular meeting Sixth-day, the 18th. The program of entertainment consisted of a drama. It was a humorous play entitled, "The Mouse Trap." The players seemed to get into the proper spirit and the meeting was very much enjoyed. Some new members were received and a short business meeting held. Preparations are being made for a joint meeting with Eunomian.

Eunomian Literary Society held its regular meeting Sixth-day. A very earnest discussion rose as to ways and means for making Eunomian more attractive, and all the members were exhorted to consider the question. The program consisted of a very interesting debate: "Resolved, The United States was justified in recognizing the independence of the Republic of Panama." The negative side won. The general sentiment seemed to be that it was commercial and trade interests that lead the United States into such action, and that Colombia had violated the late treaty and was attempting to get too large a reward. Frederic Price recited, "A Waterlogged Town," after which the meeting adjourned.

The Young Friends' Association held its regular meeting on First-day. The life of Benjamin Hallowell was well treated in a paper by Louise Fahnestock, after which Dean Bond read "Glimpses of the English Summer School." In this very enjoyable paper she described the delightful time which she spent there, outlining the work which these English Friends are doing. She explained their adult and junior First-day school system. From the pleasure with which the paper was received it must be acknowledged that more interest was excited in English affairs. Lucis N. Robinson read a paper on "An Outsider's View of Friends." He outlined his experience with Friends and their works. He was very critical of the Young Friends who, he said, showed far less religious enthusiasm than the young folks of other denominations. He caused a very excellent and enthusiastic discussion.

In the meeting First-day, Joel Borton spoke. Upon those who had never heard him he made a very decided impression. To his old friends he was very welcome. His sermon was refreshing and uplifting, taking one from the trivial of the mean things of to-day into a realization of the necessity of a good, truthful, loving life. F. N. P.

FRIENDS' ASSOCIATIONS.

PHILADELPHIA.—The regular meeting of the Philadelphia Young Friends' Association was held on Second-day evening, Twelfth month 14th, 1903. In reply to a request from the committee in charge of the philanthropic work at Friends' Neighborhood Guild, 151 Fairmount avenue, committees were appointed to visit the Guild on the various evenings and First-day afternoons, and to report at the Second month meeting of the Association. It is hoped that others beside those on the committees will visit the Guild, and learn the value and real character of the work done there. Feeling that our members and many others would be grateful for such an expression, the program of the meeting was made a tribute to the life of Isaac H. Hillborn. His address, "Principles and Testimonies of the Society of Friends," was read by Joseph C. Emley. Rowland Comly read a most appreciative tribute to his character and influence, followed by a few general remarks. In the silence that closed the meeting, so strongly was each mind and heart filled with thought of him, that it seemed as though his loved presence was with us once more. CAROLINE FARREN COMLY, Sec.

SOLEBURY, PA.—The Young Friends' Association of Solebury held its Twelfth month session in the meeting house on First-day, the 13th, with Martha Simpson president and Edith Michener secretary pro tem. After a time of silence the president read the Scripture lesson, followed by the secretary, who gave an excellent resume of Dr. Swain's paper given at the last session on "The Study of Nature and the Bible."

Hugh Michener read extracts from the journal of Elizabeth Davis, a minister well known at Horsham, Gwynedd and Germantown, in 1834. The writer warned the young against expensive entertainments, which were not conducive to upright religious life.

William M. Ely and Joseph B. Simpson commended the moral courage of a Friend who recently entertained in an humble manner, from principle; although others were setting an extravagant example. The Discipline was read by Margaret A. Lownes.

William M. Ely spoke of several books recently published, which are of interest to Friends, among these were a comprehensive biography of George Fox; Sallie Wister's Journal, and courtship of Hannah Logan, youngest daughter of James Logan, Penn's private secretary, and whose descendants still own land in Solebury.

As a tribute to John G. Whittier, whose birthday occurs on Twelfth month 17th, Agnes B. Williams read items of interest from "Life and Letters of John G. Whittier," by S. T. Pickard. The writer married a niece of Whittier and this biography is considered the most authentic account of his early manhood, when he showed a political trend, though a poetic vein permeated his writings.

Eastburn Reeder and Martha B. White, delegates to the conference at Wilmington, Delaware, report that out of the 43 associations in America, under care of the several yearly meetings, 36 were represented upon this occasion. An excellent review of the addresses delivered upon this occasion were given.

Joseph B. Simpson spoke of the growing practice, of these different creeds, to meet together in Christian unity and love to discuss religious topics and worship together.

Seth T. Walton discussed the subject and thought that the open door in literature and religion was more readily accepted than the open door in commerce, and thought the conferences of all religious associations were both interesting and beneficial.

Edith Michener, William M. Ely, Agnes B. Williams, Richard Roberts and Martha B. White were appointed to nominate officers for the ensuing year.

On account of the day's inclement weather it was decided to invite Ely J. Smith to address the association at another date. At the first month meeting Eastburn Reeder will report on history, Martha B. White, Discipline; Agnes B. Williams, literature; Herbert Walton, current topics.—[Doylstown Intelligencer.]

CHESTER, PA.—The Friends' Association held a regular meeting Twelfth month 11th. After a portion of Scripture has been read by Charles Palmer papers were read on the subject of Christmas customs in different lands. "Sweden" was the subject of a paper by Irvanna Wood. "Holland," by Jennie M. West. "Russia," Laura C. James. "England," by Chester Cutler. "Holy Land," by Joseph Paschal. These papers were all of great interest at this season of the year and were amusing as instructive.

Dora A. Gilbert then recited "The Master Ole Bull" a narrative showing the great power of music.

After a period of silence the meeting adjourned to meet First month 8th. KATHARINE M. STEVENSON, Clerk.

QUAKERTOWN, PA.—The Young Friends' Association met at the home of Jane M. Foulke, on the evening of the 17th of Twelfth month. In the absence of the president, Isaac W. Reeder called the meeting to order, and after a brief silence, opened the meeting by reading the 4th chapter of I Corinthians. The election of officers was next in order, the result being: President, Frank Ball; vice-president, Hannah M. Penrose; recording secretary, Ella M. Ball; corresponding secretary, Annie B. Roberts; treasurer, Emma Shaw; executive committee, Eleanor Foulke, E. Irene Meredith, Sada R. Johnson. A continued reading was then given of the "Life of Benjamin Hallowell," by Anna E. Jordan; also a select reading entitled, "Praying for Papa." Annie B. Roberts read a poem, "Christmas Day"; Eleanor Foulke read "The Power of Personal Influence," by William George Jordan; a recitation was given by Martha A. Johnson, "Christmas Reform." Sentiments were given. Anna S. Foulke favored us with music before and after the meeting. Our next meeting will be held at the home of Joel and Ella Ball, First month 21st, 1904. A. B. R., Cor. Sec.

NEW YORK CITY.—A regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association of New York and Brooklyn was held in Brooklyn, Twelfth month 13th, 1903, with a much larger attendance than usual, plainly showing the interest roused by the new course of papers on the prominent ethical teachers of the past. As the Association had gathered rather tardily the usual reports were put aside, and no business other than the address on Plato was considered, except the appointment of a committee to present names for officers for the coming year. A large number of those present participated in the discussion following the address, which was considered most interesting. WALTER HAVILAND, Sec.

MANSFIELD, N. J.—The Young Friends' Association met at the home of Elizabeth A. Scott, Twelfth month 5th, 1903, with twenty-six members in attendance. The vice-president called the meeting to order and read the twenty-third Psalm.

After the reading of the minutes of the previous meeting, and the reports of the various committees, the literary exercises were opened by Mary R. Moore, who read from the Discipline the portion on "Meetings for Discipline."

"Why did the Children of Israel, during their forty years in the wilderness, have perpetual miracles?" was thoughtfully answered by Mabelle E. Harvey. She stated, "From the beginning of Moses' career we see that God's miracles to him and the Children of Israel during their forty years wanderings were given to strengthen their faith. Many to-day often feel that God has forsaken them, until some miracle has been performed. They do not realize that they are receiving each day a gift from him. They lose faith, and like the Children of Israel, need encouragement from God."

Martha E. Gibbs read the address of Howard M. Jenkins from the Asbury Park Conference Book. "Men Always Fit for Freedom," was the title of a reading by William A. N. Black.

The question, "Is there ever a time when Truth is out of season?" was answered in a well-written paper by Elsie Pray. She said, "This question must be answered individually." The writer cited two famous men of the seventeenth century on this subject, namely—Alexander Pope and Thomas Fuller. The former said, "He who tells a lie is not sensible how great a task he undertakes; for he must be forced to invent twenty more to maintain one;" while Fuller said, "If you want to gain a reputation for eccentricity and be universally dreaded, if not hated, blurt out the plain truth on all occasions." In conclusion she stated, "if we keep the Golden Rule in mind, we cannot go far astray."

Johanna Shreve answered the question, "How may Friends best influence the masses?" She said in part, "The age is practical and demands evidences of true religious work in Christian professors, with activity also in the direction of the elevation of humanity. Can we not as a society show this, though small in numbers? It has been said that Friends were afraid to mix with the outside world. How then can they expect to influence those from whom they hold aloof?" The writer thought an extension of the principles of Friends was needed, and stated that those engaged in the business world had an especially good opportunity to advance these principles. After a period of silence the meeting adjourned. ANNA COLLINS SCOTT, Sec.

LITERARY NOTES.

"CONQUERING SUCCESS," by William Mathews (Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston, $1.50 net) is a collection of short essays full of helpful suggestions given in an interesting way. The following is one of the many good stories which the volume contains: "Eighteen years ago there was a fifteen-year-old boy employed in carrying drinking water to the men in some steel-works. He did his work so well, however, and always had such cool water and was so diligent in looking after the men's wants, that he attracted the attention of the workmen. A little later an office-boy was needed, and this boy was remembered and rewarded with the job. There he pursued the same policy, and in five years a superintendent's assistant was needed. He was given the place. A little later he became manager, then superintendent, and now he is president of the Carnegie Steel Company, employing 60,000 men. That water-boy is now President Cory."

For the Contemporary Men of Letters series (New York: McClure, Phillips & Co.), the critic, Ferris Greenslet, has written an agreeable and appreciative study of Walter Pater.

We still need a large volume that shall fully interpret Pater to us; and if his letters could be given, we should doubtless have many fresh and beautiful utterances. But within the compass of the present essay is much excellent criticism. One must give himself to admiration if he would rightly estimate the fascination of Walter Pater's golden books. This the author does, and with something of his master's subtle care for words that shall most fitly express the thought. Thus he speaks of the famous passage on Leonardo's picture, as peerless "in its mellow and musical cadence, in its close and adroit felicity of characterization, and in its charm of historic suggestiveness."

If anyone questions the influence of such a rare teacher as Walter Pater, or inquires what the choicer culture of Oxford may be, let him take for reply this fine interpretation by Greenslet:—

"So, holding fast this old doctrine of nihil humani athenum, he strove by retrospective generalization upon the past life of the world not to minimize the actual details of personal life, but to enrich them with the significance of the whole; but to disown the present, but to chasten to-day by the solemn procession of yesterdays. It is hard to see what worthier end scholarship could propose to herself."

J. R. II.

Advocates of the peaceable solution of national difficulties will read with interest Ernest Crosby's article in the North American Review, "If the South had been Allowed to Go." The writer claims that if the Southern States had been permitted to withdraw from the Union without opposition, the final result would have been the abolition of slavery and a reunited nation, without the evils that have resulted from the Civil War. W. L. Scruggs, in discussing "Citizenship and Suffrage," says that property and educational qualifications do not violate the Fifteenth Amendment, so long as they apply equally to all citizens, black or white. Such restriction may be thought inexpedient, "but it violates no vested right, either under the law of nature or the fundamental law."

In "The Christ Story," by Eva March Tappan (Houghton, Mifflin & Co., $1.50 net) the life of Christ from his birth to the Ascension is told in a modern way that will interest children. Two features of the book are especially noticeable; the descriptions of the country and of the life of the people that are woven in with the story, and the many reproductions of famous paintings and photographs. In the "Christ Story" itself, emphasis is laid on the supernatural elements in the stories of the birth, life, and death of Jesus.

The Springfield, Mass., Republican, now in its 80th year of service, is a strong, clean and attractive newspaper. Its weekly issue gives the news of the world in a condensed form, with able editorial comment thereon, and also contains an excellent literary department. It is a non-partisan paper, opposed to war and imperialism, and is earnest in its application of democratic principles to new social conditions and problems.

"My Four Religious Teachers" (The Sunday School Times Co., Philadelphia) is the last book written by the late Henry Clay Trumbull, editor of the Sunday School Times. He says in the preface, "I have not included my mother, nor my Sunday-school teachers, yet my earliest impressions were given by them." The four men of whom he writes were men under whose instruction and influence he was brought at the time he was entering on the Christian Life. They were Charles G. Finney, David Hawley, Elias R. Beadle and Horace Bushnell. He was particularly thankful for their breadth of thought and deep feeling and that none of them were bound by hard and fast rules of theological teaching. This probably helps in accounting for the usefulness of the author's life in non-denominational labors.

The book is pleasing and instructive on the whole, although it is hard to reconcile a religious worker's concurrence in some of the expressions of one of the "teachers" made during the Civil War, in which the author was a chaplain.

CURRENT EVENTS.

GOVERNOR TAFT has offered the Friars in the Philippine Islands $7,250,000 for the 403,000 acres of land claimed by them, and they have agreed to accept this instead of the $15,000,000 which they originally asked. These lands will be sold by the Government to the tenants now living upon them, who will be allowed to buy on long-time payments at a very moderate rate of interest. The purpose is to create as many land-owners as possible, for it is believed that such a body will do much to keep the peace. The question of the withdrawal of the Spanish Friars has practically settled itself, as it is stated that only about 200 now remain in the islands.

HENRY GEORGE, JR., made an address in Philadelphia the other day, and in reply to the question by one of his audience, "If a panic should come, do you think some people would blame it upon the trades' unions?" said: "Undoubtedly; and it is too bad that some of the criticism would be justified. Trade unionists took Sam Parks from prison, re-elected him and put him in front of their Labor Day parade, not because they are bad men, but because he, as their leader, had obtained better conditions and wages for them. They looked at results, and if he did take money by blackmail, they reasoned that it was from the 'sharks' he got it. We can't expect the men who work the hardest to be the wisest or always choose wise leaders. So long as you divide the people into two hostile camps, one having a monopoly of production and distribution, and the other struggling to get better working conditions from the monopolies, you will have a conflict that will naturally bring forth some bad men on both sides."

THE Indian Rights Association, of which Philip C. Garrett is President, held its 21st annual meeting in Washington last week. S. M. Brosius, the Washington agent for the Association, charged Tams Bixby and other members of the Dawes Commission, with being stockholders in companies dealing in Indian lands. President Roosevelt has selected Charles J. Bonaparte, of Baltimore, to make a thorough investigation of the charges. Commissioner of Indian Affairs William A. Jones expressed the opinion that only when the Indian agencies are abolished and the Indians absorbed into American life will the Indian problem be solved. Through the efforts of the Association the tradeship monopoly has been broken and any person of good moral character may obtain a license to trade with the Indians.

A BILL has been presented by Premier Combes to the French Chamber of Deputies forbidding all teaching by religious orders. Five years are allowed for the complete carrying out of the proposed law, the adoption of which will close 1,299 schools for boys and 2,195 schools for girls. To take the place of these the bill provides for the enlargement of public schools conducted by the Government. It is difficult for Americans, bred in an atmosphere where all religions and all kinds of religious teaching are tolerated, to understand how a law that so restricts religious liberty can be enacted in a country calling itself a Republic.

THE report of Commissioner Rothrock to the Pennsylvania Forestry Association states that the State forests now include 600,000 acres and that in three years more the area will reach 1,000,000 acres. The Pennsylvania Railroad proposes to re-forest the South mountain region to supply the demand for railroad ties. The National Government is establishing new forestry reservations every year and is striving to protect the timber on unreserved public lands. Local forestry organizations have called attention to the ruthless cutting of evergreen trees at Christmas time, the supply far exceeding the demand.

WALDEN University, a negro institution under the care of Methodists, at Nashville, Tennessee, was burned, many students and others being killed and injured.

SLAVERY is abolished in the Moro province, General Wood having put in force the anti-slavery law passed two months ago by the legislative council of the province.

DIPLOMATIC pressure is being brought to bear on Colombia by several European Powers to persuade her of the futility of going to war with the United States and of attempting to regain Panama.

THE Sea of Azov, which forms the northern sub-division of the Black Sea, has receded to such an extent within a few days that at some points the bed of the sea is visible for thousands of feet.

THE Senate passed the Cuban Reciprocity Bill by a vote of 57 to 18; the President immediately issued a proclamation declaring the reciprocity treaty to be effective ten days from Twelfth month 17th.

JUST when there are most ominous signs of the decline of Pennsylvania oil fields news comes of a wonderful flow of oil from a new well in West Virginia, which produces 80 barrels an hour, netting $3,600 a day.

THE level of the Great Salt Lake, Utah, is gradually falling because of the evaporation and the diminishing supply of drainage water, due either to a change of climate or the denudation of the mountains by the lumbering industry.

THE Methodist Year Book for 1903, just issued, estimates the Church membership, including probationers, as 3,029,560, an increase of 29,265 over 1902 and 29,886 over 1900. There are now 28,213 church edifices, valued at $131,203,120.

THE President has tendered the position of Civil Service Commissioner, made vacant by the death of John R. Procter, to General John C. Black, of Illinois, present Commander-in-Chief of the Grand Army, and Commissioner of Pensions under President Cleveland.

THE new Williamsburg Bridge from New York City to Long Island was opened on the 20th. The new structure exhibits wonderful progress in engineering, but with its skeleton towers, straight roadway and lack of ornamentation is in striking contrast artistically to the stately and imposing Brooklyn Bridge.
